HAPPY HOMECOMING

Family members embrace at Ben-Gurion Airport last week as they reunite at a ceremony for new olim to Israel. The final charter aliyah flight for 2009 – organized by Nefesh B'Nefesh and the Jewish Agency, in co-operation with Israel's Ministry of Immigrant Absorption – brought 210 new immigrants to Israel from the United States and Canada. The flight capped off a record year for North American aliyah, in which some 3,800 new immigrants moved to Israel from North America. (Please see the related story on page 3.) Canadian philanthropist Nathan Jacobson, who was recently appointed Canadian chair of Nefesh B'Nefesh, sponsored the final aliyah charter flight of 2009.

Israel energizes Michigan's batteries

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN
ISRAEL 21c

TEL AVIV — U.S. government incentives are looking to transform America's battered auto industry and Israel could play a part.

Israel is already a supplier of parts to the Big Three car companies – General Motors, Chrysler and Ford.

The executive director of the three-year-old Michigan Israel Business Bridge, Ron Perry, says that with the new focus on electric and hybrid cars, Michigan could benefit from collaboration with Israeli battery researchers.

"The history of Michigan and Israel in the automotive industry has been one in which several kibbutz companies in Israel that produce automotive supplies, and lower-level companies, sold to the Big Three and new companies, such as automotive tech companies," Perry said, adding that General Motors has a research and development facility in Israel.

As they restructure and build more focused and leaner brands, the Big Three in Michigan are looking to build smaller cars, as well as plug-in hybrids and electric cars.

Cotler urges world action against Iran

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Liberal MP Irwin Cotler released a petition calling on the United States, the United Nations, the European Union and the International Court of Justice to impose sanctions on Iran

Some 25 foreign and local journalists, dignitaries and human rights activists gathered at the King David Hotel on Dec. 30 for the release of the petition, which was drafted by the former justice minister.

The petition was timed one day before U.S. President Barack Obama's deadline for Iran to show progress in meeting international requirements that it end its nuclear weapons program.

Cotler's petition is not only a call to action to respond to the Iran's nuclear program. It is also a call to respond to Iran's state-sanctioned incitement to genocide, its support of international terrorism and its massive domestic human rights violations.

"The evidence is clear. Iran has defied and mocked the international community. Iran is in standing violation of international legal prohibitions against the development and proliferation of nuclear weapons. Iran has already committed the crime of incitement to genocide, and Iran is engaged in widespread and systematic violations of the rights of its own people," Cotler said.

"This petition is the sounding alarm, a wake-up call to the international community. The time to act is now."

Attending the release were the executive director of the Palestine Human Rights Monitoring Group Bassem Eid and, via teleconference, Harvard University law professor Alan Dershowitz and British MP Denis MacShane.

The News in Brief

CANADA

JCC Gets $1M Grant

EDMONTON — The Jewish Community Centre of Edmonton will get a $1-million federal infrastructure grant to help it demolish and rebuild its current facility, the Edmonton Journal reported. A spokesperson said the Jewish Federation of Edmonton is finalizing construction and financial details for the multimillion-dollar centre and hopes to "move ahead" in the spring. The economic stimulus grant will come from the $500-million Recreational Infrastructure Canada program, which will invest in facilities across Canada over two years.

Protesters Square Off

TORONTO — Some 200 pro-Israel ralliers faced off Dec. 27 against a similar number of anti-Israel protesters in noisy but peaceful gatherings outside the Israeli Consulate in Toronto. The two sides stood on opposite sides of Bloor Street, separated by police, Sun Media reported. The anti-Israel protesters were there to support a "Gaza Freedom March" on Dec. 31 in Cairo, as well as to mark the one-year anniversary of the start of the war in Gaza.

WORLD

Madoff Hospitalized

BUTNER, N.C. — Bernard Madoff was back in his cell last week after being hospitalized for injuries consistent with an assault. A North Carolina TV station reported Dec. 24 that Madoff was hospitalized at Duke University Hospital the previous week with facial fractures, broken ribs and a collapsed lung. A Bureau of Prisons spokesperson later said he was being treated in his Butner, N.C., prison's hospital for hypertension and dizziness. The financier is serving 150 years for a multibillion-dollar Ponzi scheme.

Teacher Reassigned

LAS VEGAS — A Las Vegas teacher who reportedly denied the Holocaust in front of students in November won't lose her job. Lori Sublette, a gym teacher at the Northwest Career and Technical Academy, has been reassigned to work at home, with salary and benefits, during a school district probe. But a Nevada law prohibits teachers from being fired for "unprofessional conduct" unless they've been cited previously for a similar offence, the Las Vegas Sun reported. Sublette denied the Shoah during a discussion in a class that prepares students for life after high school, including saying the Nazis didn't have the technology to kill millions of Jews. Students also said she told them information on the Holocaust in history books was doctored or distorted. She reportedly apologized to a parent, but only for giving her opinion in class.

Apology To Jews Genuine, Carter Says

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Jimmy Carter is asking Jews for forgiveness, but he insists it's not simply because his grandson is launching a political career with a run for the Georgia state senate.

Jimmy Carter

In a letter released to JTA, the former U.S. president sent a seasonal message wishing for peace between Israel and its neighbours. He concluded: "We must recognize Israel's achievements under difficult circumstances, even as we strive in a positive way to help Israel continue to improve its relations with its Arab populations, but we must not permit criticisms for improvement to stigmatize Israel. As I would have noted at Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, but which is appropriate at any time of the year, I offer an Al Chet for any words or deeds of mine that may have done so."

Al Chet refers to the Yom Kippur prayer asking God for forgiveness for sins against Him. In modern Hebrew, it refers to any plea for forgiveness.

Carter outraged Jewish leaders with his 2006 book Palestine: Peace not Apartheid. They strongly criticized him for what appeared to be his likening of Israeli settlement practices to apartheid and placing the brunt of blame for a lack of peace on Israel. On a book tour, he hinted the pro-Israel lobby inhibited an even-handed U.S. policy.

Jason Carter, 34, an Atlanta-area lawyer, is considering a run to fill a seat in suburban DeKalb County if incumbent David Adelman is confirmed as President Barack Obama's ambassador to Singapore. The area has a number of universities and a substantial Jewish community.

Carter told JTA that ethnic electoral factors weren't reason enough to reach out, although he didn't outright deny it was a factor. "The number of Jewish voters in [the district] is only two per cent," he said, chuckling.

Israel 'unrivalled' in clean technology, smart agriculture

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Sheldon Potter and Jonathan Moneta, co-chairs of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's aliyah committee, are trying to promote an image of Israel that goes beyond the Mideast conflict.

"Israel is a world leader, and there are opportunities there that are unequalled anywhere in the world," said Potter.

Israel is "unrivalled" in clean technology, smart agriculture, fresh water production and renewable energy, and it has one of the wealthiest economies in the industrialized world, he said. "There are incredible opportunities for new olim."

He added that Tel Aviv University has a higher commercialization rate than the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. "It has some [wonderful] success stories."

Liane Sela, the Jewish Agency's aliyah shlichah for Canada, said that Israel's economic strength "puts it on the map. It is a tremendous place to raise a family and make a living."

By having 24-year-old Moneta on the committee, Potter said, they hope to reach a new market. "He knows how young people think, and we're trying to catch them while their lives are in transition.

"We want to [convey] the message that Israel is a good place to start their lives. We want them to research schools in Israel. New olim don't pay for university. We're trying to plant the seeds for them to live there."

Sarah Mali, a former olah from England who is now a community shlichah for the Jewish Agency and director of Israel engagement for UJA Federation, said federation wants young people to go to Israel and discover the "grand narrative of the Jewish People and create their own personal story."

The Jewish Agency for Israel announced that 3,767 new immigrants from North America will have moved to Israel in 2009, an increase of 17 per cent over the 3,124 who came in 2008.

Of the 2009 olim, 3,324 were from the United States – a 19 per cent increase over last year and a 36-year high – while 443 hail from Canada, a six per cent increase over 2008.

The JA said the olim took advantage of absorption opportunities, including kibbutz ulpan, Ulpan Etzion and university studies.

In the last week of 2009, 400 new immigrants – who were included in the annual figures – were to have arrived in Israel – 200 from North America on a flight that was to have arrived Dec. 30 in partnership with Nefesh B'Nefesh.

Liran Avisar, head of the JA's aliyah delegation in North America said, "we are proud of the attractive and innovative absorption options which we provide olim – from Hebrew ulpan to job options. These difficult economic times have prompted people who were considering aliyah to decide that now is the time."

Change in year, not in hope

From the editor's desk...

It is profoundly distressing but morally imperative that the first column of 2010 begins with an expression of condolences to the families, loved ones and friends of the six Canadians who were killed in Afghanistan during the last two weeks of 2009.

Lt. Andrew Nuttall, 30, was killed Dec. 23 during a foot patrol in Panjwaii district in Kandahar province.

One week later, on Dec. 30, four soldiers and a journalist were killed when the armoured vehicle in which they were travelling touched an improvised explosive device in Kandahar city. Sgt. George Miok, 28, Sgt. Kirk Taylor, Cpl. Zachery McCormack, 21, and Pte. Garrett William Chidley, 21, and Michelle Lang, 34, a Calgary Herald reporter covering the conflict for Canwest News Service were killed in the powerful blast.

There are no words to abate the losses suffered by the families and friends of the fallen. There are only words of sympathy and condolence, which we so earnestly convey.

Since Canadian troops went to Afghanistan eight years ago as part of the NATO mission, 138 Canadian soldiers and two civilians have been killed there.

We salute our soldiers' courage.

And we pay deep tribute to the memories of the soldiers who did not return home from the mission so far away.

The soldiers' deaths last week in Afghanistan were part of a clearly orchestrated offensive that was intended to heighten the violence against western forces specifically during the Christmas holiday period. That same day, eight Americans were killed by a suicide bomber in Afghanistan.

The Taliban and their allies tried to impress a theological as well as a military point against the unbelieving, predominantly Christian forces of the West.

So, too, did the Taliban's soulmates, Al Qaeda. The Yemen-based wing of Al Qaeda set loose their suicide terrorist to commit his murder against helpless victims over the skies of Detroit on Christmas Day.

Thus, we begin this new year as we did last year: taking heart and example from the men and women in the armed forces of all freedom and democracy-loving nations who fight against tyrants, despots and oppressors of all stripes, religious or otherwise.

The road to a more peaceful world appears, alas, to be a long one still. Moreover, there is a sharply uncomfortable sense in the pit of the stomach that, in humanity's long march toward a better world, that we have already tread upon these very same pavement stones, yet we are making no forward progress.

For example, in Israel last week, the air force destroyed two tunnels leading from the northern and southern Gaza Strip toward the Jewish state. The tunnels were obviously intended for infiltrating into Israel and attacking Israeli civilians and possibly, even soldiers.

The attacks against the tunnels were in response to the firing of a rocket at the city of Netivot last Thursday.

Since the end of the war in Gaza in mid-January last year, more than 280 rockets and mortars have been fired at Israel. This number is vastly reduced from the more than 3,300 rockets and mortars that were fired at Israel from the Gaza Strip in 2008 prior to the outbreak of the Gaza war. But of course, too, it is vastly more than would be aimed at Israel were its neighbours in Gaza intent upon building Gazan society rather than destroying that of Israel.

Similarly, we read reports that Hamas refuses to agree to an exchange for the kidnapped soldier Gilad Schalit. A delegation of Hamas leaders from Gaza returned from Damascus after two days of talks about a possible agreement for Schalit. Germany is attempting to mediate a prisoner exchange with Israel. Hamas promised to give its official answer to the German mediator in "the coming days."

As reported in JTA, Mahmoud Zahar, a member of the Hamas politburo, told reporters last week that "Hamas didn't close the door for Schalit's deal. Debates and discussions are still going on in Hamas, although we have some reservations on the recent Israeli offer."

As part of any agreement for the release of the kidnapped Schalit, hundreds of Palestinian prisoners will reportedly be released from Israeli prisons. However, Israel has reportedly refused to release a number of senior leaders of Hamas who were directly involved in the killing of Israelis. In addition, Israel refuses to allow some 100 of the Palestinians who are on the list to be freed to return to the West Bank.

The asymmetry in the prisoner exchange equation bespeaks with crystal-clear fractal precision a higher asymmetry at the core of the conflict between Israel and the enemies who strive to deny it independent sovereign life in the Middle East.

Every single human life is precious. Thus, every single human life must be protected against the evil that pays humanity and human life no regard.

It is this belief that drives and inspires the armed forces that defend Israel, even as it does the armed forces of the western democracies. First and foremost, they are defending oppressed peoples who are yearning to be free from the Taliban and Al Qaeda, but ultimately they are also defending our respective societies at home.

The new year begins as the last began. We maintain our hope. We never lose our hope. – MBD

Vandals strike kosher restaurant — twice

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Toronto Police Service is investigating two incidents of vandalism that targeted the city's largest kosher restaurant late last year.

King Solomon's Table was struck by vandals on two occasions – the last, just before the holidays, saw the 310-seat venue daubed with two large swastikas on the restaurant's loading doors facing a back laneway. About four weeks earlier, a can of whitish paint was hurled at the front door, locks and sidewalk.

King Solomon's Table daubed with swastikas

The incidents, particular the one involving Nazi imagery, distressed restaurant owner Joe Elmaleh.

"I was shocked," said Elmaleh, who runs the family business. "It's very clear from the name we are a Jewish institution. We've been around 16 years. The fact someone would do this is very upsetting."

Police responded quickly on both occasions, but according to Elmaleh, the incidents took place at night when the restaurant was unoccupied. Police are examining surveillance videos belonging to a nearby tenant for clues. Police were unavailable for comment.

It took a full day to scrape off the paint from the first incident, and the swastikas remained on the back doors until police photographed them as potential trial evidence.

Elmaleh said the latter incident made him feel "sick to my stomach. I felt violated," he said.

Israel's high-tech revolution explained

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel's economy once rested on the export of agricultural produce, textiles and polished diamonds.

Not so today.

In the six decades since its birth as a sovereign state, Israel has morphed into "a high-tech powerhouse," write Dan Senor and Saul Singer in their new book, Start-up Nation: The Story of Israel's Economic Miracle (McClelland & Stewart).

Israel's transformation is such that the authors describe the Jewish state as "the country with the highest concentration of engineers and research and development spending in the world."

Consider the following statistics.

Per capita venture capital investments in Israel in 2008 were 2.5 times greater than in the United States, more than 30 times greater than in Europe, 80 times greater than in China, and 350 times greater than in India.

In addition, Israel, after the United States, has more companies listed on the NASDAQ than any other nation, including China, India, South Korea and Singapore.

Terrorism, wars and economic recessions have not slowed Israel's march to high-tech stardom.

As they put it, "During the six years following 2000, Israel was hit not just by the bursting of the global tech bubble but by the most intense period of terrorist attacks in its history and by the Second Lebanon War. Yet Israel's share of the global venture capital market did not drop – it doubled, from 15 per cent to 31 per cent.

The factors that account for Israel's ascent are clear.

The Arab boycott forced Israel to be inventive and innovative, thereby creating an "entrepreneurial culture."

Israel's isolation within the Middle East prompted Israelis to embrace the computer, software and telecommunications because, in these industries, borders, distances and shipping costs were virtually irrelevant.

"This, in turn, positioned Israel perfectly for the global turn toward knowledge-and innovation-based economies, a trend that continues today," observe Senor and Singer.

France's arms embargo against Israel in the wake of the Six Day War forced Israel's defence industry to produce military equipment such as tanks (the Merkava) and fighter aircraft (the Nesher and the Kfir, improved versions of the Mirage). These projects resulted in the production of avionic systems, among other technological breakthroughs, that helped jump-start the high-tech boom.

After the 1973 Yom Kippur War, the Israeli armed forces established a special unit for the top two per cent of its new recruits. Its purpose was to maintain Israel's scientific and qualitative superiority over its enemies.

Once admitted into this elite program, cadets took university-level courses in mathematics and physics and thereby filled the technological needs of the Israel Defence Forces.

The graduates of these courses became some of Israel's top-flight academics and high-tech entrepreneurs.

Senor and Singer elaborate: "It is no coincidence that the military – particularly the elite units in the air force, infantry, intelligence and information technology arenas – have served as incubators for thousands of Israeli high-tech start-ups."

The mass migration of Jews from the Soviet Union to Israel had an impact as well. As they say, "Though the Israeli government struggled to find jobs and build housing for the new arrivals, the Russians could not have arrived at a more opportune time. The international tech boom was picking up speed in the mid-1990s, and Israel's private technology sector became hungry for engineers."

With the Russian immigrants in mind, Israel established technology incubators – 24 in all – that gave Russian scientists and engineers the resources and financing to research and develop cutting-edge products.

Israeli chutzpah and the anti-hierarchical "culture of doubt" also played a role in advancing Israel's high-tech sector.

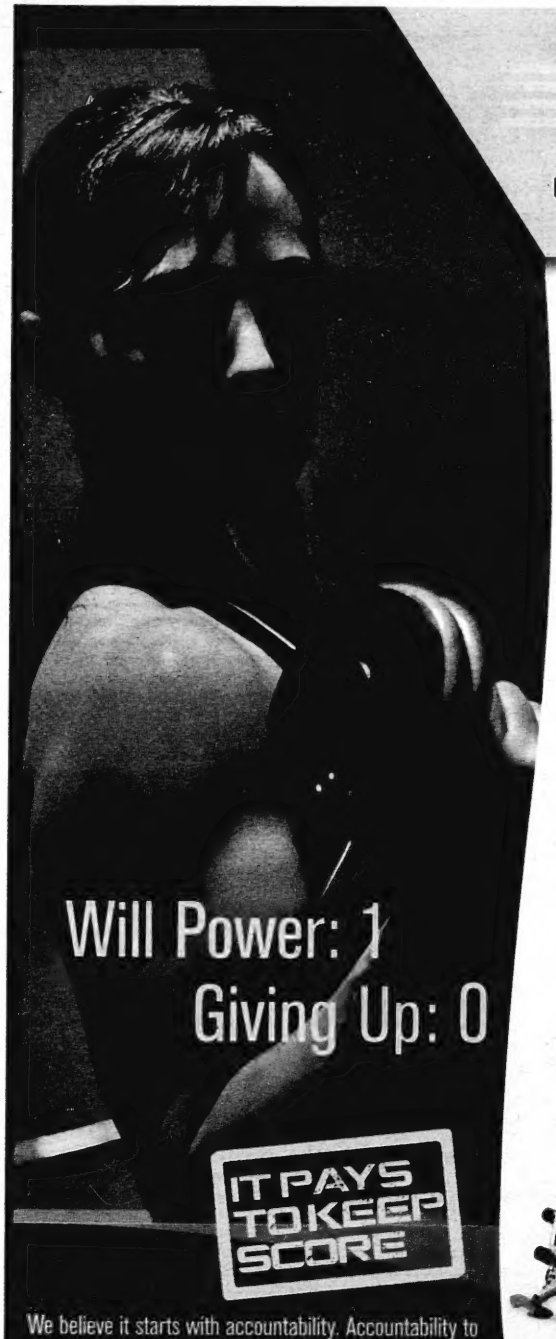
"Employees challenge their bosses, sergeants question their generals, and clerks second-guess government ministers," Senor and Singer write.

Consequently, little is taken for granted, yielding new ideas and fresh concepts.

So there you have it. Now you know why Israel has become a high-tech power.

Correction

The article "Day program launched for Alzheimer's patients" (CJN Dec. 24) should have stated that the initiative is the first Jewish day centre for seniors in York Region; that the agencies involved have worked together on other projects, and that the program is a partnership of five organizations: Circle of Care, Baycrest, the Alzheimer Society of York Region, JIAS Toronto and Reena.



We believe it starts with accountability. Accountability to yourself and measuring your progress by keeping score.

Ultimatum: Iran

The deadline imposed by the Obama administration and its international allies upon the regime in Tehran to reduce its stockpile of low-enriched uranium has come and gone. That deadline was Dec. 31. The United Nations-backed proposal was essentially a plan to stall, not halt, the Iranian drive for nuclear weaponry.

According to the plan, Iran would export most of its stockpile of low-enriched uranium for further enrichment in Russia and France, where it would be converted into fuel rods. The rods would be returned to Iran about a year later. The rods would not be usable in the production of weapons.

Tehran was given an ultimatum to agree by the end of last year or suffer the penalty. The penalty, presumably, will be the imposition of much tougher sanctions.

We are now awaiting the response of the Obama-led coalition.

We need not await the response of mullah-led, Iranian government. Not only has Iran abjectly refused to accede to the end-of-December demand, it has turned the tables and imposed its own deadline on the West. As reported last weekend, Iran set a one-month deadline for the West to accept a counter-proposal by which the West would either sell or swap nuclear fuel to Iran. "We have given them an ultimatum. There is one month left and that is by the end of January," Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said on state television.

Failure by the West to agree to Iranian terms, Mottaki warned, will result in the immediate enrichment of uranium to a higher level than the level at which Iran currently purports to enrich uranium. Higher grade enrichment is required for the making of nuclear weapons. Neither the International Atomic Energy Agency, the United Nation's nuclear watchdog, or the U.S. State Department commented on the Iranian proposal over the weekend.

Though there was silence in Vienna and Washington in the face of the Iranian threats, there was a very loud and articulate response last week in Jerusalem.

At a conference in Jerusalem, Canadian Liberal MP Irwin Cotler introduced a petition he is spearheading that calls upon governments around the world and the UN to immediately impose far-reaching diplomatic and economic action against Iran. He is joined in his initiative by a blue-chip panel of international jurists, activists and public officials that includes Harvard University law professor Alan Dershowitz; British MP Denis MacShane; Bassam Eid, executive director of the Palestinian Human Rights Monitoring Group, and Prof. Suzanne Stone of Yeshiva University's Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law.

As of this writing, more than 60 people have signed the petition. Former Canadian prime minister John Turner is among the signatories, as are Elie Wiesel; Per Ahlmark, former deputy prime minister of Sweden, and Kamal Hossain, former minister of justice and minister of foreign affairs of Bangladesh.

We commend Cotler for the initiative, and we urge Ottawa to act upon it with the urgency that the situation warrants.

The Israeli government and the Jewish Agency for Israel officially revealed that the vast majority of Ethiopian Jews had been secretly airlifted to Israel. When the story was prematurely broken to the media by Yehuda Dominitz, the Jewish Agency's director of aliyah, the airlift was halted by Sudan and Ethiopia, who feared repercussions from other members of the Arab League.

Eternal Jewish Family a divisive force

The allegations of sexual and financial misconduct against Rabbi Leib Tropper, the founder and director of Eternal Jewish Family (EJF), are embarrassing and offensive to every Jew ("Rabbi quits group," Dec. 24). But there is another, perhaps related, trait that applies to EJF as a whole that should not be obscured by the latest controversy. Created to establish "universal standards" for conversion to Judaism according to Jewish law, Rabbi Tropper and EJF have expended much effort trying to delegitimize others. Through the alliance of individuals and organizations in Montreal with EJF, they have become a dangerously divisive force here in our community.

Our conversion program, the Montreal region of the RCA (Rabbinical Council of America), has been relentlessly defamed by EJF for purely political reasons. Our rabbis are among the most highly respected and beloved in Montreal. We take no remuneration for our service. Our standards and curriculum follow the highest requirements of Jewish law, and our conversions are recognized throughout the world. But Rabbi Tropper and EJF have told prospective converts to leave our program, they denounced us to the Israeli chief rabbis, and they caused unfounded doubts among our converts about their future acceptance as Jews – all with no basis, simply to bring themselves more power.

We hope that as EJF goes through this crisis, they – and those individuals and organizations who are allied with EJF – will re-evaluate their tactics and come to work together with others, like us, who share the same goal – conversions done with respect and sensitivity according to the highest standards of Jewish law. This is how religious Jews should behave.

Egyptian doctors promulgate blood libel

The Egyptian Medical Syndicate has promulgated a 21st-century version of the blood libel against Jews. On Nov. 27, the syndicate's head, Dr. Hamdi Al-Sayed, declared that the decision to bar Israeli physicians from the October 2009 breast cancer regional conference in Egypt was based on the torture of Palestinians and the theft of their organs by Israeli doctors for use in transplantation. This outrageous charge betrays the virtual absence of modern scientific principles of objectivity and verifiability in countries where fanatic religious and political forces distort education, research and the application of new discoveries for the betterment of the human condition.

Doctors against Racism and Anti-Semitism (DARA) urges all institutions that sponsor scientific and medical events to consider carefully where they allocate their resources. As we saw in the case of the breast cancer conference in Egypt, the political and religious agenda trumped the pursuit and spread of knowledge. The Susan G. Komen for the Cure Foundation learned that it could not trust the assurances of the Egyptian government to provide a venue accessible to all participants. Israeli experts in breast cancer management were boycotted at the insistence of xenophobic, anti-Semitic hatemongers.

Israel punished for being nice

The answer to those who call east Jerusalem "occupied territory" is simple. When did east Jerusalem become Arab territory? When the Jordanians took over the city by force in 1948 and expelled the Jews who had lived in the Old City for centuries. So in 1967, would the world have preferred it if the Israelis had expelled all Arabs from east Jerusalem? Then, under the same logic, it would now be Jewish territory. Israel is thus punished for being nice to the Arabs of Jerusalem.

Play confronts tensions in Orthodox world

I'm currently acting as project consultant for Theatre Passe Muraille's upcoming Toronto production of Yichud (Seclusion) by Julie Tepperman. Yichud (Seclusion) is the first play I have seen that engages with Orthodox Jewish custom with nuance, precision and artistic integrity. As both a theatre practitioner and an Orthodox woman, I appreciate that Yichud (Seclusion) directly confronts the tensions that exist in the Orthodox world, specifically pertaining to issues of acculturation and religious agency, without placing tradition and modernity in opposition to each other.

Tepperman's groundbreaking play captures the beauty of Orthodox ritual without sacrificing its depth or complexity. It debunks racist stereotypes against Orthodox Jews through honest religious exploration and rigorous character development. The most provocative thing about this play is that it embraces mainstream Orthodox lifestyle, unveiling its hidden intricacies and penetrating beyond the status quo.

Politics and the press clash in Israel

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

Should a billionaire tycoon who lives abroad be entitled to use his money to influence Israeli political life?

This question came to the fore in early December when a group of Knesset members moved to bar American Jewish casino mogul Sheldon Adelson from owning a free Israeli daily newspaper that supports Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

The Knesset bill, which is being promoted by a collection of interested parties ranging from owners of competing newspapers to rival politicians, stipulates that, as is the case with the electronic media in Israel, only Israeli citizens or residents should be eligible for licences to own Hebrew-language newspapers in Israel.

"Imagine if a Saudi businessman were to own a newspaper in Israel," Kadima legislator Yoel Hasson declared somewhat disingenuously, since the bill clearly was directed at Adelson.

Sheldon Adelson

It's far from clear that the anti-Adelson campaign will succeed even if the bill is passed. Adelson easily could appoint a straw-man owner, or even hand over the paper to his wife, Miriam, who is Israeli-born.

The arguments for and against, however, go far beyond the Adelsons, and touch on the very essence of democracy and free speech in Israel.

The newspaper, Yisrael Hayom (Israel Today), was launched 2-1/2 years ago, and has been so uncritical in its support of Netanyahu that it has been dubbed the "Bibiton," a play on Netanyahu's nickname, Bibi, and the Hebrew word for newspaper, iton.

Its opponents argue strongly against it. First, they say it provides a venue for foreign money to shape the Israeli agenda. Additionally, they complain, Yisrael Hayom is nothing more than a propaganda sheet for Netanyahu posing as a genuine newspaper and taking in masses of gullible readers. For Netanyahu to buy that kind of publicity would have cost millions; the free newspaper with nationwide distribution could be seen as campaign funding from a foreign source, which might run afoul of Israel's strict campaign financing laws. Worse, say critics, the newspaper's free distribution – some even get home delivery free – and super-low advertising rates create an uneven playing field that threatens to destroy the competition.

The loudest complaints come from journalists at the daily Ma'ariv, which is already tottering. Ma'ariv columnist Ben Dror Yamini said Adelson is ready to spend as much as it takes to wipe out all the existing Hebrew dailies. He predicts that Ma'ariv will be the first to go, followed by Yediot Achronot. Within a few years, Yamini says, Israel will be left with a monopolistic party political pamphlet and no free press. His Ma'ariv colleague Ben Caspit calls it a hostile takeover of democracy and free speech.

Their dire predictions, though, appear somewhat exaggerated.

Besides Yisrael Hayom, Israel has only three other Hebrew dailies: Ma'ariv, Yediot and Ha'aretz. And although Ma'ariv is not expected to survive much longer, Yediot remains a powerful economic empire. For Ha'aretz, the emergence of Yisrael Hayom has actually provided a boost in the form of significant printing revenues: Adelson's newspaper is printed on Ha'aretz's press.

Yisrael Hayom

For his part, Adelson dismisses the agitation against him as a ploy for power and market share by his competitors, notably Arnon Mozes, the publisher of Yediot.

"Mozes, the publisher of Yediot, is the most powerful man in the State of Israel, and all he wants is to maintain his power, and he manipulates the government," Adelson told JTA in an interview earlier this month. "Mozes will make a deal with anybody to advance his own personal financial agenda, so he controls everything. He was able to make or break any politician, and he uses that as a lever to get whatever he wants from the political sphere. Why is he always thumping on Bibi? Because he can't control Bibi."

Adelson also said the notion that Yisrael Hayom is a vehicle for Netanyahu is nonsense.

"Everybody thinks I started the newspaper Israel HaYom purely to benefit Bibi. Nothing could be further from the truth," Adelson said. "I started the newspaper to give Israel, Israelis, a fair and balanced view of the news and the views. That's all. It is not a 'Bibiton.'"

In a long, often angry response to the charges against the paper, Yisrael Hayom's editor, Amos Regev, echoed those arguments, accusing the owners of Ma'ariv and Yediot of acting out of fear of losing their once-prodigious influence.

Regev also argued that since electronic media use airwaves, which is state-owned space, the government is entitled to impose limitations on their ownership. Print journalism makes no use of public resources, however, and therefore should not be subject to restriction. Regev cited numerous examples of major newspapers around the world run by overseas owners, noting Australian-born Rupert Murdoch's vast media empire.

Others on Regev's side add that newspapers are entitled to have political agendas and to support politicians. American newspapers, for example, regularly endorse candidates for political office. As for the claim that Adelson's pockets are so deep that Yisrael Hayom competes unfairly by offering free distribution, Regev says this is necessary for print newspapers to compete with free Internet news websites.

Dahlia Dorner, the president of Israel's Press Council and a former Supreme Court justice with considerable moral authority in Israel, calls the Knesset bill to outlaw foreign ownership of Israeli newspapers "inappropriate."

Dorner supports Regev's distinction between TV channels and newspapers and says it would be wrong to limit newspaper ownership. The more newspapers there are, the healthier the marketplace of ideas and Israeli democracy, she says.

This analysis, of course, makes two implicit assumptions: that all the other newspapers don't fold because of the uneven playing field, and that at least some continue to carry out the fourth estate's most important functions: democracy watchdog and fearless critic of the powers that be.

Print journalism is in deep crisis

By GABRIEL WEIMANN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

In recent years, a harsh, cruel, existential war has raged here – a war that attracts hardly any public attention, even though its outcome will have critical implications for Israeli society.

This war is not raging in Israel alone. All over the world, print journalism is in deep crisis. In recent years, sales of leading western newspapers have declined and those that have not been closed have had to make cruel cuts, firing reporters and making their employment terms worse.

The main factor in the abandonment of newspapers by both readers and advertisers is the Internet, along with the free dailies, which are gaining increasing market share. Nonetheless, we must condemn the initiative by newspaper owners who joined forces with Knesset members in an effort to pass a law that would harm the Israel Hayom freebie because its owner, Jewish billionaire Sheldon Adelson, is a foreign citizen.

This initiative crudely and zealously merges the Knesset members' political interests with the economic interests of Israel Hayom's competitors. But a bill directed at a specific individual cannot save Israel's press. Moreover, it must be remembered that the entry of Israel Hayom, the country's most widely distributed freebie, did not create the problem; it merely exacerbated the situation.

Nevertheless, behind this hasty legislative initiative hides real distress on the part of the entire press – and this should concern us all.

An independent and financially solid press is a courageous, determined press able to expose folly and corruption. A weak press is a fawning press that courts advertisers, submits to their dictates and tries to appease politicians. Every newspaper that closes will reduce the media supply in Israel and transform the watchdogs of democracy into frightened poodles. If Israel Hayom wipes out one of its competitors, and this is certainly a possibility, Israeli society as a whole, and not just the owner of the newspaper that closes, will be harmed.

The solution must address the whole problem. Let us examine what has been done in other countries instead of hastily passing laws.

French President Nicholas Sarkozy has announced several measures to protect print journalism, at a cost of 600 million euros. These measures include doubling the amount of government advertising in the press, giving generous tax breaks and proposing to give every 18-year-old a one-year newspaper subscription.

When radio commercials were first broadcast in Israel, there was fear that this would hurt the print media. Therefore, "broadcast advertising services" were established under government auspices, in which the newspapers also took part. In this way, they were partially recompensed for their loss of income from advertising that moved to the radio.

When Israel's first commercial television station, Channel 2, began to broadcast, the law compensated newspapers that were not partners in the station's franchise, as well as the owners of movie theaters.

Government aid to the press, which is supposed to criticize the administration, raises fears of undermining its independence. However, the alternative – the collapse of the press – is even scarier.

An urgent solution is essential for the continued existence of an independent press in Israel, and therefore for the protection of this country's quality of life.

Gabriel Weimann is a professor of communications at Haifa University.

Opinions

Me-Jews or We-Jews?

Living in Israel doesn't make me a better Jew, but it does make me more Jewish.

In Canada, my Judaism is primarily religious. My faith manifests itself in observance, holy study, synagogue attendance and suchlike. Passionately committed though I am, it's still only a part-time activity, especially in my retirement. In Israel, I'm a full-time Jew by just being there. As Rabbi Daniel Gordis of Jerusalem's Shalem Centre put it, in the Diaspora, being Jewish is a choice, but in Israel, it's an instinct.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

A well-rounded Jew is a Jew both by choice and by instinct. In Canada, my Jewish instincts only kick in when anti-Semites attack us or when Jews in other countries are in distress. That's when I express solidarity by sitting on committees, writing petitions, attending rallies and offering whatever tangible support I can. At other times, I belong to one of many faith communities.

The more comfortable we become as individuals in the Diaspora, the less concerned we are with the Jewish collective. "We-Jews" become "Me-Jews." Judaism here is largely a private matter. When embarrassed about religion, we call it "spirituality" and at times even dilute it with borrowings from other traditions. That's why Diaspora Judaism is prone to being sporadic, inconsistent and – yes – assimilationist. Even when it nourishes the Jewish soul, it pays insufficient attention to the Jewish body.

In Israel, on the other hand, I'm a Jew 24/7, whether I like it or not. Jewishness there is so intense that many try to escape it periodically. Perhaps that's why Israelis are inveterate travellers. Perhaps that's also why I divide my time between Jerusalem and Toronto – between full-time Jewishness and part-time Judaism, between high maintenance and low impact.

True, the impact is higher in Canada than in other countries, because of its strong Jewish links to Israel. For example, two-thirds of Jews in Canada have visited Israel, twice the ratio of the United States. The less Diaspora Jews are involved with Israel, the more self-centred and idiosyncratic does their Judaism become. That's as true of the religiously lukewarm as it is of fanatics.

The more marginal Israel is in the lives of contemporary Jews, the more likely that Judaism will become irrelevant to their descendants. It's in danger of being reduced to culinary nostalgia masquerading as culture at the one end of the spectrum and blind fundamentalism in the guise of piety at the other.

That's why, notwithstanding the risks and frustrations of living in Israel, life there isn't only exciting, but also a source of hope for the future of our people and our faith.

The duality of Jewish leadership

Forget for a moment the ridiculous accusation that Israel is an apartheid state and put aside the errors that Nelson Mandela has made regarding his attitude to Zionism. I want to write about leadership and wish to use the powerful film Invictus as an illustration.

Seymour Epstein in Toronto

In it, Mandela has just been elected president of South Africa and uses the Afrikaaner love of rugby as a ploy to unite the country. Whether or not the film is historically accurate, it does portray two essential elements of leadership that must work in concert for full effect. Mandela had a vision of reconciliation (even forgiveness) as the only way for South Africa to regain its integrity and to flourish. He turned to another kind of leader, a rugby team captain, Francois Pienaar of the Springboks, to assist him in his vision.

Achad Ha'am (Asher Ginzberg, 1856-1927) described the dynamics over history of the two modes of leadership in his famous essay, Kohen v'navi (Priest and Prophet). The Torah gives us ample illustration in the lives of Moses and Aaron. Moses is the visionary prophet, while his brother assumes the role of priest. Each function alone is necessary for true leadership, but not sufficient in itself. The two modes must support and complement each other for leadership to achieve its full potential.

We see the negative effect of pure visionary prophecy in Exodus 6:9. God has just given Moses a moving account of how He cares for the suffering Israelite slaves in Egypt, how He recognizes the covenant He made with their ancestors, and how He intends to liberate them, deliver them from bondage, and bring them to Canaan, the promised land. Both the message and the language are stirring, but when Moses delivers the vision to the Israelites, they could not pay attention due to their "shortness of breath and hard labour." Too much vision, not enough connection to the common folk.

And we note the sad outcome of too much concern for the people's needs later in Exodus 32, in which Aaron the priest acquiesces to the demands of the Israelites and helps them build a golden calf for cultic celebration at the very moment when Moses is on the mountain receiving the word of God.

Back to Mandela, whose noble vision of a reconciled and unified South Africa was more than either whites or blacks could stand. He needed a priestly leader to give the common folk a banner they could all salute, and that was a win in the Rugby World Cup. The interaction between the two becomes a complex dialogue in the film, with each kind of leader asserting himself in differing ways.

That is precisely the kind of dialectical leadership we need as a people, both in Diaspora communities and in the State of Israel. We need people of vision who can appreciate our past heritage of values, history, literature, and culture, and find a way to translate that great inheritance into a vision of Jewish peoplehood for the future. To complement those visions and to translate them into action, we also need leaders who care for all kinds of Jews and who respect all the 21st-century legitimate and authentic expressions of Jewish life so that the prophetic mission of the Jewish people is tempered by the realities of today.

True leadership of vision and integrity doesn't come about by accident. We must plan for it by educating ourselves and our children into deep Jewish literacy. Jewish identity is not enough. It produces followers. Jewish literacy produces leaders.

Invictus is a poem by William Earnest Henley that inspired Nelson Mandela in prison. Google it to see what English literacy did for him. Then imagine what our literary heritage could do for us.

Imagining a Canada-worthy museum

Spending the past four months exploring the vast and rich archives of the Holocaust Museum in Washington, D.C., has gotten me thinking not only about my research, but also about museums. Sitting at my desk atop the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, in a city blessed with an abundance and a diversity of museums, I find myself musing about the nature and mission of museums, especially those that might be thought to be charged with fulfilling a Jewish mandate.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Most museums present either a cultural vision or a historical narrative, or some combination of the two. The Jewish Museum in New York, located opposite Central Park on Fifth Avenue, is a cultural enterprise, an art museum. It features art by Jewish artists, art that explores Jewish themes such as identity or the sacred. It does not set out to tell a comprehensive history of the Jews. Implicitly, and sometimes explicitly, it poses such questions as whether there is such a thing as "Jewish art," and if so, what might define it. As art does, it mounts exhibits that may be provocative and push the boundaries of convention and propriety – such as the exhibit a number of years ago that looked at the place of Nazi imagery in contemporary art, "Mirroring Evil." Its visitors are interested in Jewish culture, in specific artists whose works are exhibited, or in cultural diversity.

By contrast, New York's Museum of Jewish Heritage, at the southern tip of Manhattan, is built on a historical narrative. Visitors moving through its permanent exhibition trace a linear path that begins with immigration from Europe to America over a century ago, encompasses the Holocaust, the creation of the State of Israel and the renewal of postwar Jewish life in America. The overarching story arc links the Jewish narrative to the American one – migration from the narrower and less tolerant Old World to the dual promise of freedom and opportunity in the New World. The walk through the exhibit arrives finally at a bank of windows overlooking the lower Hudson River, gazing on the Statue of Liberty.

The Holocaust Museum in Washington is not a Jewish museum per se, at least not in the ways that the two New York museums are. Like the Museum of Jewish Heritage, it is driven by the desire to tell a historical story. Te move through its permanent exhibition is to move through chronological time. Yet its mission is to tell an American story. It begins with the entry point that seeks to capture the horrifying sights that greeted American soldiers liberating concentration camps, and seeks to tell a story that is specific but also has broad implications. Although there are museums in Washington with more beautiful holdings, and others with a more upbeat message of progress, it is the Holocaust Museum that has – since its opening – drawn the most visitors.

And yet, although the Holocaust Museum is an American one and not a Jewish one, it is experienced by Jewish visitors as a Jewish museum. In part, this is because the Jewish experience – the Jewish catastrophe – is the dark heart of the experience it depicts. In part, the perception of the Jewishness of the museum emerges from the involvement of Holocaust survivors from its conceptualization to the actualization and evolution of its plans. In part, Jewish visitors – whether or not they have a familial link to the Holocaust – cannot help but see themselves and their ancestors reflected in the exhibitions. Whether it is the tower of photos conceptualized by Yaffa Eliach, or the depictions of destroyed communities and severed families, most Jewish visitors are affected personally. Several have referred to some parts of the museum as "Jewish sacred space."

One might say the Holocaust Museum is both American space and Jewish space, the one overlaid upon the other, intangibly but palpably. This essential duality, I believe, makes the museum a draw for people who have no a priori connection to the Jewish experience, but draws them in to this aspect of the Jewish past.

Canada needs a Jewish museum enacted in the Canadian idiom with comparable ambition and reach to anchor the Jewish experience on the Canadian landscape.

The Kirshner File

A year after the war in the Gaza Strip

A year after the eruption of the three-week border war in the Gaza Strip, a modicum of calm has settled on Israel. Data released by the Israeli army last month suggests that there has been a 90 per cent reduction in the number of rocket and mortar attacks on Israel originating from Gaza. Land-based infiltration attempts from Gaza, however, have not let up.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Israeli forces swept into Gaza in a war of self-defence, known as Operation Cast Lead. Israel's goal was to stop the missile barrages, which have killed 19 Jews, Arabs and foreign workers since November 2001, the second year of the second Palestinian uprising.

Israel's success in sharply reducing rocket and mortar attacks is a significant development, a testament to its renewed deterrent power and its ability to keep its enemies off balance, at least until the next round of fighting.

Two months ago, in a sign of the times, Hamas – which has ruled Gaza since the 2006 elections and its successful insurrection against the Palestinian Authority about a year later – arrested hotheads planning to fire rockets at Israel. The militants were detained because Hamas – which represents the rejectionist wing of the Palestinian national movement and is explicitly opposed to Israel's existence – is currently interested in abiding by the unofficial ceasefire that effectively ended the war in Gaza on Jan. 18, 2009.

Hamas' decision to hold its fire stems from a pragmatic desire to reconstruct Gaza and rebuild its forces, both of which were shattered by Israel's fierce offensive.

But smaller organizations such as Islamic Jihad, the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade and the Popular Resistance Committees, though having promised Hamas to honour the truce, have resumed attacks on Israel, albeit on a much smaller scale than before the war.

By one estimate, they have launched nearly 300 rockets and mortars at Israel since the war. The last reported attacks occurred in mid and late December and Jan. 1, when several rockets hit open areas in Sderot and Netivot, causing neither casualties nor property damage.

These attacks, though limited in frequency and scope, are disturbing. But compared to the days when such projectiles struck Israel on an almost daily basis, the situation is fairly tolerable.

The Israeli government of then-prime minister Ehud Olmert launched Operation Cast Lead on Dec. 27, 2008, to end this reign of terror. Until then, Israel had carried out retaliatory raids and targeted assassinations of Palestinian officials, including Sheik Ahmed Yassin, the spiritual leader of Hamas. These pinprick reprisals had no lasting effect and emboldened Hamas and its allies.

Hamas, in a shift of tactics, began firing rockets and mortars at Israel in the spring of 2001, shortly after Israel rebuilt a security fence enclosing Gaza that Palestinians had torn down. The fence was extremely effective, all but preventing Palestinian marauders and suicide bombers from sneaking into Israel. Hamas intensified its attacks following Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza in the summer of 2005.

From 2001 to 2008, some 10,000 rockets and mortars slammed into Israeli towns and villages, destabilizing the lives of one million Israelis. During this tense period, an Israeli soldier, Gilad Schalit, was kidnapped in the course of a Hamas raid on an Israeli fortified position facing Gaza.

The effectiveness of the barrier was not the sole reason why Hamas invested in Iranian and Syrian rocket technology.

Hamas also bridled at Israel's land and sea blockade of Gaza, which, though severe, does not affect the flow of food, fuel and medical supplies into Gaza.

Israel imposed the siege after Hamas defeated its arch rival, Fatah, in the 2006 Palestinian parliamentary election.

Hamas hoped that missile strikes would induce Israel to lift the embargo, but this did not happen.

Hamas was further isolated when Egypt, fearing a spillover of Islamic fundamentalism from Gaza, instituted its own blockade. The Egyptians took this step in the wake of Hamas' violent seizure of Gaza.

Egypt – which signed a peace treaty with Israel in 1979 – tried to defuse the volatile situation adjacent to its border by inducing Israel and Hamas to sign a series of temporary truces. The Egyptian mediator, Gen. Omar Suleiman, was the director of Egypt's military intelligence service.

The truces he arranged all broke down, but he was not discouraged. In June 2008, he brokered yet another ceasefire, but it collapsed after Hamas chose not to renew it unless Israel lifted the siege of Gaza.

In short order, Hamas intensified its bombardment of Israel, forcing Israel to act decisively. Israel's war aims were three-fold: to bring peace to southern Israel, restore its deterrence after years of erosion and hobble Hamas' military capabilities

The Israeli Air Force initiated hostilities with a wave of devastating strikes on Dec. 27, 2008 that killed more than 200 Palestinians in the first 24 hours. Hamas retaliated by firing scores of rockets and mortars at Israeli towns that had never been hit before, including Be'er Sheva and Yavneh.

On Jan. 3, Israel expanded the conflict by invading Gaza. Israeli troops did not try to penetrate too deeply into Palestinian refugee camps, where Hamas is based. As well, Israel secretly bombed a Gaza-bound Iranian arms convoy in Sudan.

Despite the ferocity of Israel's assault, Hamas managed to fire more than 500 missiles into Israel, some of which were deliberately launched from civilian buildings and mosques.

Hamas' ability to exact retribution on Israel was sobering. It was indicative of the fact that Hamas remained standing and unbowed in spite of the drubbing it took on the battlefield. In direct confrontations, Hamas fighters did not particularly distinguish themselves, but Hamas as an organization did not disintegrate.

Israel's land, air and sea operation was destructive, causing damage to the tune of $2 billion in Gaza and resulting in the deaths of some 1,400 Palestinians.

Israel's losses were 13 killed.

Militarily, Israel won the war, but it has paid a heavy price for its victory in terms of its international image.

A United Nations commission, headed by South African Jewish jurist Richard Goldstone, concluded that Israel – and Palestinian armed groups – committed war crimes and possibly crimes against humanity. Israel protested, but Goldstone's accusations have planted serious doubts in some quarters about Israel's behaviour.

In the year since the war, Israel has virtually pacified the Gaza border region, but it has not staunched the flow of weapons into Gaza through tunnels. Indeed, smuggling has returned to pre-war levels, if not exceeded them, notwithstanding Israel's claim to have destroyed 300 tunnels along the Philadelphi corridor, the narrow zone separating Israel from Gaza. Judging by the latest reports, Hamas has smuggled upgraded weapons into Gaza, notably long-range rockets capable of reaching Tel Aviv and anti-tank missiles that can penetrate heavy armour.

At Israel's urging, Egypt has begun building a massive iron wall along its border with Gaza to cope with the upsurge of smuggling. But it remains to be seen whether this barrier will be effective.

In the meantime, Israel is developing the Iron Dome missile defence system, which is due to be operational by the summer. It will be needed. Hamas, which is strongly entrenched in Gaza, has regrouped and rearmed. As Israeli Chief of Staff Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi suggested recently, Israel may well be forced to fight in Gaza yet again.

Dead Sea remains popular destination

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

EIN BOKEK, Israel — They say the bromide in the air has a calming effect on the nerves, but it certainly didn't seem to slow down Toronto native Stanley Morais at a recent news conference promoting travel to the Dead Sea.

Morais, former head of El Al's Canadian office, added a jolt of energy to a press briefing meant to tout the virtues of the Dead Sea region. Morais joined local promoters and Israel government tourism officials who urged travel reporters and tour operators to promote the Dead Sea as a travel destination.

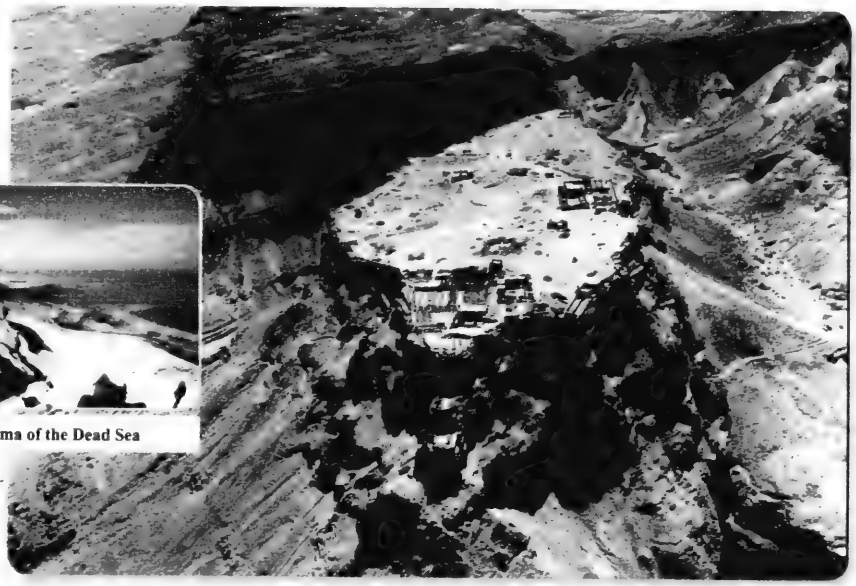
Between them, they painted a glowing picture that reinforced visitors' first-hand experience of enjoying the unique bromide and oxygen-enriched atmosphere at the lowest point on the face of the earth – 420 metres below sea level.

The area, they pointed out, is in the running for selection as one of the New 7 Wonders of Nature. It recently advanced to the final 28, joining an exclusive club that includes Angel Falls in Venezuela, the Amazon, Australia's Great Barrier Reef and Canada's own Bay of Fundy. You can vote online at www.new7wonders.com.

It's no wonder the Dead Sea is considered a world wonder. With 30 per cent salinity, it is 8.6 times saltier than the ocean, making floating for even confirmed "sinkers" like myself easy as pie. Just don't get any in your eyes, and if you have an open cut, expect a stinging sensation.

Because the Dead Sea is so far below sea level, it benefits from the screening powers of the extra atmosphere, making tanning safer than at higher elevations. It has a higher oxygen content than at sea level, and the region's mud offers therapeutic healing powers for those afflicted with skin diseases.

Panorama of the Dead Sea



An aerial view of Masada

For visitors, the area has just about everything a traveller to the Holy Land could want, including a selection of accommodations from tourist class to luxurious, good food and easy access to such historical sites as Masada. It's also close to the nature reserve at Ein Gedi, and it has 330-plus days of sunshine per year, as well as the healing powers of the Salt Sea.

The area attracts visitors from around the world, including those seeking the region's curative powers. Some European countries underwrite stays for patients that last several weeks. People with arthritic conditions also respond well to the area's dry climate and local treatments, which can be found pretty much in all the area's hotels.

According to Ofra Gazit, marketing and public relations manager for the Tamar Regional Council, which includes the west bank of the Dead Sea, there are 4,000 rooms in 15 hotels (including kibbutz Ein Gedi's guest house) along the Dead Sea, and despite the international recession, they were 80 per cent full in 2009.

Dov Litvinoff, mayor of the Tamar Regional Council, said $10 million (US) will be invested in the area in the next three to four years. Among the projects on tap are a seaside promenade, beach development, constructing a convention centre and a new park for concerts. There's even a suggestion that the area will one day accommodate a small landing strip, to make the transfer from Ben-Gurion Airport that much easier.

All this is part of an ongoing effort to attract even more visitors from around the world. A recent trade and marketing conference promoting the Dead Sea attracted tour operators, travel agents and reporters from 15 countries, including Canada, the United States, Brazil, Italy, England, South Korea, France and Russia. Some 42 per cent of the area's hotel occupants hold foreign passports, with Americans, Russians, Germans, French and Italians the most ubiquitous.

Still, it's homegrown Israelis who come to the Dead Sea in the greatest numbers. On a recent Friday night at a Dead Sea hotel, the sounds of joyous Shabbat singing gave the hotel a uniquely spiritual atmosphere.

Culture is a major selling point for local officials. In June 2010, the Herodian fortress of Masada will serve as a backdrop for the staging of Verdi's opera, Nabucco, while a year later Aida will be staged.

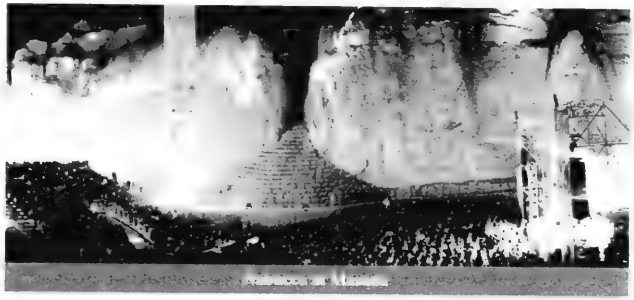
Nabucco promises to be a spectacular event and will be broadcast live in high definition to 60 countries.

Gazit points out another potential for growing the area's tourism business. While it's still only a vision, it would see the promotion of a sea to sea to sea to sea vacation, which would take travellers to sites on the Mediterranean, Dead and Red seas along with the Sea of Galilee.

As for Morais, he's busy directing the development of El Al's international business. The feather in his cap is an arrangement reached with American Airlines, which allows U.S. passengers to fly with El Al ticket coding and more seamlessly make the connection to Israel-bound aircraft.

With Israel's tourism potential expanding – ministry officials expect to better last year's three million in 2010 – El Al is seeking to expand its presence in non-traditional markets and develop others that promise a bright future, such as India, Shanghai and Sao Paulo in Brazil. Many of the visitors will no doubt end up at the Dead Sea.

The region is about to become a lot more multicultural and diverse.



Shmoozing at the spa

EIN BOKEK, Israel — The first person I ran into at the Dead Sea was Patrick. He and I shared a Jacuzzi along with a third fellow at the -2 level of the Moriah Classic Hotel – not to be confused with the older Moriah Plaza.

The -2 level – two stories below ground level – is where the Classic has its spa, which offers two kinds of whirlpool baths, a heated pool of Dead Sea water, heated freshwater pools, dry sauna and wet steam plus showers.

If you're familiar with the hotels alongside the western shore of the Dead Sea, the Moriahs are pretty much the most southerly of the bunch and somewhere in the middle when it comes to quality.

Anyway, Patrick.

Patrick was a friendly fellow eager to strike up a conversation. I was still tired from the 11-hour flight from Toronto to Israel, plus the more than two-hour drive from Ben-Gurion Airport to the Dead Sea hotel strip that went via the country's coastal road, then east through the northern Negev, past Arad and then down a roller-coaster of a road to Ein Bokek.

En route we stopped for a bathroom and leg-stretching break at a dusty truck stop, where I learned that the salesperson at a store, carrying a full line of Dead Sea products, came from the nearby yishuv of Meitar. It's "the best place in the world to live, quiet, everyone's nice," she professed. It seemed like a dusty outpost in the middle of nowhere to me, but to each their own.

Come to think of it, she was the first person I met in Israel.

But back to Patrick.

Patrick hailed from Singapore and, despite his name, had no Irish blood. In fact, he was eager to explain his Chinese origins and the reason for his visit to Israel. He was visiting the Holy Land along with his family as part of a Christian group, and he mightily admired the Jews. They are part, he explained, of one of the most ancient cultures in the world, even older than the Chinese.

With a smile on his face, he explained that in the Cantonese language, the character for sacrifice was an altar with a lamb on top, something very Jewish, suggesting there may have been some contact between the peoples in ancient times.

When he asked about my heritage, I told him "Jewish." His response: "So, you're home."

For the Israeli Ministry of Tourism, which sponsored my recent visit, getting someone like Patrick to the Holy Land must be like winning the trifecta at Toronto's Woodbine Racetrack – a Christian pilgrim who brings his family and visits the Dead Sea, as well as holy sites in Jerusalem and the Galilee. Oh, and who's eager to tell his friends about his trip to Israel when he returns home.

Book explores world of 19th century gay Polish Jew

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — You know attitudes have evolved when an Orthodox rabbi writes a foreword to a novel about what it might have been like to be Jewish and gay in a 19th-century Polish shtetl, a book that has clear autobiographical elements.

Montrealer David Brody's self-published book Mourning and Celebration is introduced by Rabbi Daniel Sperber, president of the Institute for Advanced Torah Studies at Bar-Ilan University in Israel.

Brody is gay and observant.

"Times have changed, and even among Orthodox Jews, there is a growing understanding of the tragic situation in which a religious homosexual finds himself," Rabbi Sperber writes. "There is a greater willingness to view the phenomenon with sympathy, rather than cause the 'gay' to be an outcast, a pariah in his own community."

Rabbi Sperber says that homosexuals must be granted "full admission into the community," despite the seeming challenges Jewish law poses.

Part of the reason for this evolution is due to people like Brody going public with the anguish they felt in their own community, he continues.

Brody, a translator by profession who has lived in Montreal since 1968, dedicates the book "to the thousands of voiceless souls whose anguish could rise only to heaven." Through the main character Yankl, he is attempting speak for the many gay Jews of the past who dared not reveal themselves.

He explains that his objective in writing this work of fiction was to gain recognition that, though things have advanced, the place of homosexuals within Orthodox Jewry has not been resolved.

Brody and Rabbi Sperber, now in their late 60s, went to school together in London, England. The latter said he had no idea that Brody was gay at the time because he apparently concealed it so well.

Homosexuals must be granted 'full admission into the community,' says Rabbi Sperber

Mourning and Celebration also contains testimonials from other rabbis, including Rabbi Adam Scheier of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, where Brody has been a member for many years and feels is fully accepted, even though the synagogue is traditional.

Rabbi Scheier comments that Mourning and Celebration is a story of "a conflicted world that most neglect to imagine even existed," adding that it is, "tragically, timeless." He says he considers Brody "my teacher in the implications of what transpires when deep emotional longing meets moral blindness."

"The Shaar is extremely open-minded," said Brody, a founder of one of the pioneering Jewish gay groups in Montreal, Yakhdav.

The Shaar granted his request to dedicate a breakfast in memory of his late partner, who was not Jewish. That was 15 years ago.

The Shaar was also one of the first traditional congregations anywhere to screen the groundbreaking 2001 documentary Trembling Before G-d, a frank examination of what it means to be Orthodox and homosexual. Brody participated in the discussion that took place afterward.

In Mourning and Celebration, Brody imagines what a hell it would have been if he had been born 100 years earlier, in the time of his grandfather, in a Jewish village in eastern Europe. His grandparents were indeed from Rypin, Poland.

Much of the book takes the form of conversations between the present-day narrator and Yankl, the shtetl dweller who must contend with living in a community where homosexuality is forbidden and regarded as wicked.

Yankl is not only gay; he is an only son, in whom much is invested by his parents. He is a brilliant scholar and a talented violinist.

From an isolated adolescence, the story follows his search for validation and human rights in a time and place when such concepts were not commonplace.

The story, however, is not a condemnation of Orthodox Judaism; on the contrary, the rabbis are humane and grapple with Yankl's "problem" in a way that causes the least hurt to everyone.

"The second objective of the book was to demystify Judaism," said Brody. "I've tried to explain Shabbat and the festivals and the different rituals." The book contains a glossary of Hebrew and Yiddish terms.

Despite having lived a century apart, there are similarities between Yankl's struggle and that of the narrator, whose early life is likewise marked by concealment and shame. In real life, Brody was the eldest son in an Orthodox family; his father had been a shochet and cantor. His parents also had high expectations of him, not the least of which was to marry and live a "normal" life.

Homosexuality was, after all, decriminalized in Britain only in 1967.

Indeed, Brody many years wanted to "change" to spare his family and went to a series of psychiatrists, before accepting himself as he was. His father did, too, in time, although his mother, he believes, never really did.

Brody, a gay rights activist in Quebec, successfully sued the province for the right of homosexuals in committed relationships to the survivor's pension. It was an eight-year court battle that ended in 2002. Brody, whose partner of 23 years died, believed gays had just as much right to the benefit as any common-law couple.

Brody considers himself "lucky to have lived to see the complete evolution of gay emancipation and I feel very lucky to be living in Canada. I never dreamed I would see legalized [same-sex] marriage.

"But I think the final victory for gay rights will come when we don't talk about it anymore like we don't talk about the women's vote," Brody said.

'My aliyah started here'

"Between 10 and 15 representatives will be available for consultation about anything that has to do with Israel, and one-on-one interviews can be booked in advance," she said

"We are also looking to partner events with other organizations so that we can carry out the message about Israel in a variety of ways."

Sela said that since Montreal closed its aliyah office about a year ago, the Toronto office is the only one in Canada. "We help about 430 people a year make aliyah, and we have a higher per capita [aliyah rate] than the United States."

She said that Canada represents about 12 per cent of the aliyah numbers from North America, "and we try to offer as many absorption plans as possible. People want to have something solid to go to, so we present them with their options."

Torontonians are fortunate to have a local aliyah office, she said, because they can consult in person before they make a final decision, and afterward. "It is like having a friend nearby, helping them through every step."

Daniel Copeland, 29, works in human resources here and is making aliyah in the next few months. He reviewed a number of options, he said, and chose to attend the Beit Canada-Ulpan Etzion program in Jerusalem, a five-month program geared toward single graduates or professionals aged 22 to 35.

He has been planning the move for about a year, he said, because he feels a strong connection to Israel and the Jewish People.

"I believe Israel will do something for my Jewish identity. It is hard for my parents, but they are being very supportive."

Liana Rose, 26, a music therapist who has a fiance in Israel, is also planning to make aliyah. She fell in love with the country while on a Birthright Israel trip, she said. "The energy is unparallelled."

Having a local office was important to her, she said. "My aliyah started here."

Coast to Coast

Winnipeg woman to help write a Torah

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Sofer Irma Penn is one of five women who has been invited by the Kadima Reconstructionist Jewish Community in Seattle, Wash., to complete a Torah scroll.

According to the Kadima community, this is the first time a Torah scroll will be written and embellished by an international community of women.

"I am deeply honoured and blessed to be part of the Women's Torah Project," said Penn, who has been assigned to write the Book of Dvarim.

She will be writing the Torah with Shoshana Gugenheim of Israel, Rachel Reichhardt of Brazil, and Americans Linda Coppleson and Julie Seltzer (who completed her portion earlier this year).

"By being part of this project, I can contribute something positive, while working with many other caring, dedicated, artistic, women," Penn said. "I can do something with meaning, and it's a way of connecting with God."

A writer and artist who uses her talents for the betterment of others, she was honoured as Canada's volunteer of the year by Jewish Women International in 1998. She has also won awards from local organizations for fundraising and volunteering in the community.

Penn worked as a teacher and archivist for the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada.

To become a Torah scribe is a realization of a dream she has had for 30 years, she said. Last February, she went to Israel to learn the calligraphy involved in STaM (which stands for sefer Torah, tfillin, mezuzah and megillah) – the writing of a sefer Torah.

"The only way to learn properly is to get proper instruction from someone who knows," she said.

Penn said she first studied Hebrew calligraphy by correspondence with a sofer in Jerusalem. "I learned to do Hebrew calligraphy very well," she said.

"I asked my teacher [who prefers anonymity, she said] if he would also teach me STaM. He agreed, so I went to Israel."

Penn studied for several months. "It was exhaustive and intensive," she said, "but I learned so much. I learned everything from cutting a quill to the Halachah for every letter."

She learned, for example, that there are 79,847 words in the Torah, which comprise 304,805 letters. She learned that a Torah scroll consists of 62 pages, with four columns per page, and that each page has 42 lines.

She learned how to weave the pages together with fine twine made from sheep gut.

"I went to Mea Shearim many times for materials," she said. "I bought turkey feathers [from which she made her own quills] and parchment. People there were so helpful and friendly. I was shown how to pick skins and what to look for."

In Israel, she practised writing for four or five hours every day, except Shabbat. "It was exhausting," she said. "Every letter has to be written a certain way."

Once back in Winnipeg, Penn received a commission from a friend to write a megillah, which she is halfway through writing.

"I write no more than three lines at a sitting," she said. "Then I take a break for an hour… If I try to do too much at a sitting, I start making mistakes."

She expected that she would write at least three or four megillot before she tackled a Torah, but events have overtaken her.

Along with the five Torah scribes, artists from around the world are contributing to the Kadima scroll. Women from Georgia, California, Washington, Oregon and Texas, and from Sao Paulo, Brazil, will design and craft embellishments such as the yad (pointer) and Torah cover.

"The Torah cover, or mantle, is a particularly wonderful part of this project," said Wendy Graff, director of the Kadima Women's Torah Project.

She said that anyone who donates to the Women's Torah Project is invited to contribute a bit of cloth that will be fashioned into a seed in the mantle's pomegranate motif, "thus literally becoming part of the project."

OTTAWA — After a five-year experiment as an unaffiliated, independent synagogue, Congregation Beth Shalom has decided to join the Canadian Council of Conservative Synagogues.

The decision to join the Canadian group – which was formed in 2008 by four Toronto shuls, including three that had broken away from the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism – was within one vote of being unanimous at the board level last January, and at the membership level this past November.

The congregation, Ottawa's oldest, had been Orthodox until a decision in June 2003 to adopt mixed "family seating."

Although it was hoped that the decision would attract new families to the downtown shul, a number of members were displeased and left, some to form a small Orthodox minyan in the same neighbourhood. In addition, the congregation's Orthodox rabbi and cantor at that time both left as well.

In 2005, the congregation embarked on a major refurbishment project, hired a new rabbi and introduced new programs, all in an effort to increase membership and bring people back downtown from the suburbs.

And while it was hoped that family seating would increase membership, in fact, it didn't. Some new families did join, but others left and many elderly members have died, leaving total membership in 2009 at 340 families, more or less the same as it was in 2003.

According to Jason Moscovitz, secretary of the shul's board of governors and chair of the task force that recently decided to affiliate with the new Conservative group, "when the decision to move to family seating was originally taken in June 2003, a commitment was made to revisit the concept after five years."

The review took place in January, 2008. Although the membership was generally satisfied with the direction it had chosen, it was acknowledged that the shul faced an "identity problem" of sorts, Moscovitz said.

"While we may have understood what we stood for inside our four walls, it was increasingly difficult to explain it to the community, to potential new members and, perhaps most importantly, to prospective rabbi candidates," said Moscovitz, a former chief political correspondent for the CBC.

The congregation has been without a permanent rabbi for a couple of years, with Rabbi Arnold Fine, rabbi emeritus of the Conservative Agudath Israel Congregation, filling in.

Rabbi Fine said he's pleased with Beth Shalom's decision and was grateful to have been consulted.

"They gave me an opportunity to speak at various meetings. My voice was heard, but my job was not to push them in one direction or another," he said.

The affiliation isn't expected to cause any major changes for the congregation.

"Beth Shalom will continue its practice of traditional Judaism, its use of Orthodox liturgy, as well as continue to maintain a separate-seated chapel for our daily minyan," Moscovitz said.

"Affiliation with the Canadian Council of Conservative Synagogues does not change how we conduct services. What it does is provide us with a network of like-minded synagogues. Through that network, we will be able to tap into many more resources to help us improve the many services we offer our members."

The congregation is pursuing its search for a new rabbi and is expecting its first visiting rabbi in early January.

Can we match the Mormons?

CLASS ACT
By Daniel Held

I've often heard students remark, "I'm a bad Jew. I don't keep kosher," but I've never heard one say, "I'm a bad Jews. I don't give tzedakah."

Notwithstanding their corresponding status in Halachah, somewhere along the line, ritual laws became the demarcation of Jewish identity and ethical laws lost out.

This trend is not only one of self-perceived Jewish identity, but it is solidified by our communal definition of affiliation. When we count Jews in demographic studies or when we evaluate the efficacy of educational programs such as Birthright Israel, day schools or summer camps, we look at Jewish ritual practice. We carefully scrutinize, and then bemoan, the decreasing number of Jews lighting Shabbat candles, going to synagogue, travelling to Israel, having Passover seders or, of course, marrying Jewish.

I agree that these are important indicators of Jewish identify. I'm concerned however, that teaching toward these litmus tests of affiliation serves to the detriment of other important indicators of Jewish ethical living. We teach Hebrew reading and synagogue services, and about Shabbat, holidays and kashrut, but we don't seriously challenge students to establish their own Jewish ethic.

Many of the lessons I've observed in Hebrew schools or camps relating to ethics lack the level of maturity and sophistication of other curricular content. It seems that we teach Rambam's ladder of tzedakah the same way in Grade 3 as we do in grades 6 and 9. Annual charity projects, planting trees on Tu b'Shvat and collecting food for the Passover food drive, while important endeavours, don't engender the type of passion for Jewish ethics that should be our goal.

I dream of the day when volunteering and giving tzedakah hold their rightful place in the measure of Jewish identity alongside Shabbat and kashrut. When a year of service after high school is considered a Jewish act on par with a year of study in Israel. When the expectation of celebrating Shabbat is paralleled with the expectation to give tzedakah.

We in the Jewish community have a long way to go. But it's not only us.

At this time of year, between Chanukah appeals and charities reminding us to get a 2009 tax receipt, I always get the impression that Canadians give generously. But it seems this isn't the case.

The Fraser Institute recently released its 2009 Generosity Index, which, by studying Canadian and American tax returns, analyzes trends in charitable giving. I was truly shocked by the findings.

Canadians, on average, donate .76 per cent of their income to charity. Americans, on average, donate 1.6 per cent of their income, more than double the Canadian amount.

I've always assumed that Canadians are generous. It may well be that the data shifts dramatically when we consider after-tax as opposed to pre-tax dollars. It may well be that, in considering our charitable giving, Canadians take into account the social-welfare safety net that's built into our tax system. Nevertheless, .76 per cent is remarkably low.

Jewish law – the same legal system that mandates lighting Shabbat candles and separating meat and milk – obligates ma'aser, the tithing of 10 per cent of our earnings for charity. If each of us were to do calculate our charitable giving, what would we find? Would we be closer to the national average of .76 per cent or the Jewish commandment of 10 per cent?

The most remarkable finding of the Fraser Institute study is that Utah residents, on average, donate 3.66 per cent of their income – more than four times the figure for the average Canadian.

It seems that the 60 per cent of Utahns who are Mormon can say, "I'm a good Mormon because I give charity?"

Can we Jews say the same about ourselves?

Jewish Life

Fraternity helps in the community

For the past four years, Ottawa's Alpha Epsilon Pi fraternity (AEPi) has been giving back to the Jewish community with a day they have dubbed Mitzvah Day.

On that day, many members of AEPi head down to the Jewish community centre in the early morning to play games with the kids in the gym and do arts and crafts in another room. Everyone involved makes sure all the kids get to participate in all the events.

"We take this day seriously, and it gives us a great source of pride to give back to the Jewish Community," AEPi Ottawa president Jason Friedman said. "It speaks volumes, being able to get a large number of university students awake at 8 a.m., but no one dares to utter a complaint because not only is this event important, but we also have a great time doing it."

In addition to enjoying the activity, volunteers find satisfaction in the fact that all the kids do as well.

"The kids really enjoy the sports and arts and crafts we play with them. A lot of us there have experience working with kids in camps and community centres like the JCC, so we really knew what we were doing," Friedman said.

On Campus
By Justin Dahan

AEPi has once again proven itself contrary to the negative stereotypes that tend to be associated with fraternities. While many picture the typical fraternity as focused more on parties than academia or charitable events, the members of this fraternity not only woke up early in the morning to give something back, they also enjoy being involved with other philanthropic events in Ottawa.

Annually, this Jewish fraternity donates blood – around 10 members donated their time and blood last year, and this year, the numbers are likely to rise, as a blood drive is slated to take place sometime in the second semester.

Jonathan Kohn, a member of AEPi in his third year at Carleton University, speaks about the importance of donating blood: "It's everyone's responsibility to donate if they are eligible. We can save so many lives, it doesn't make sense not to do it. I'm glad to be part of an organization that shares similar values."

This year, AEPi Ottawa has really gotten involved in campus events. For Chanukah, the fraternity teamed up with Chabad to light the menorah on campus, an event that was supported by both Jewish and non-Jewish community leaders. Among the speakers was Allan Rock, the dean of the University of Ottawa.

It is important for AEPi to have a good relationship with Rock. Last year, when anti-Israel posters were spotted around campus, Rock was the man who took the initiative to make sure they were all removed. He is a great ally for any Jewish organization to have, especially for a student organization that draws many of its members from a campus where Rock has so much authority.

It's important for AEPi to continue to grow in its philanthropic ways and continue to create bonds with such prestigious people such as Allan Rock.

Cholent: legend and lore, Part 1

The days are short. The nights are cold. And if there is one perfect Jewish food for the season, it is cholent. Since cooking is forbidden on Shabbat, cholent is precooked on Friday and left to simmer overnight. On Saturday, the fragrance of the cholent permeates the home and by midday, it's ready. But cholent is far, far more than just a Shabbat staple. Tucked away in this meaty stew, you'll find clues about Jewish law, history and the migration of Jews around the world.

Eliezer Segal suggests the humble cholent is actually "a sublime expression of Jewish identity." When the Roman satirist Juvenal depicted Jewish poverty, he said Jews only owned "a basket and a box of hay." In fact that "box of hay" is described in the Mishnah and Talmud as a way to insulate cholent on Shabbat. Centuries later during the Spanish Inquisition, tips were issued to help recognize Jews illicitly observing their traditions, including believers who precooked meals to be eaten on Saturday. [bit.ly/chol1]

Leah Koenig makes a fascinating point about necessity being the mother of cholent. "It's this creativity, born of need, that distinguishes Jewish cooking in general, and cholent in particular, from other cuisines. People of most other cultures would not have conceived of a dish such as cholent, because… they are free to cook seven days a week. Perhaps that is why some scholars identify cholent as one of the few authentically 'Jewish' recipes in a food repertoire known for adapting to and borrowing from the many different countries in which Jews have lived throughout history." [bit.ly/chol02]

And then there is the etymology of the word. An Ohr Somayach rabbi suggests "cholent" could come the French "chaud-lent" meaning "hot-slow." Rabbi Naftali Falk says it derives from the Hebrew "sh'lahn," meaning "that it stayed" overnight Friday on a fire. Whereupon Shimon Goldstein chimed in that cholent comes from "shul end," because in many communities people didn't have private stoves, so before Shabbat they all put their cholent in the baker's oven. On Shabbat morning after shul ended, everyone went to the baker to pick up their cholent. [bit.ly/chol07] (By the way, the sages of Wikipedia claim that professional linguists have "categorically rejected" the chaud-lent theory. [bit.ly/chol04])

Cholent is also firmly ensconced in Jewish legend and lore. There is the story of the simple, unlettered Jew who found himself in a new community and seated in a particularly lengthy Rosh Hashanah service. As the prayers dragged on, hunger gnawed at his insides and he noticed that the congregation had burst into tears. Why is everyone weeping? "Then it dawned on him. Of course! They, too, are hungry." Strangely, as the service continued, he detected that the weeping had abated. But why? Now, he reasoned that the congregation surely knew what sublime reward awaited them after the interminable prayers. Cholent! Everyone knows that "the longer it cooks, the more sumptuous your cholent… A few hours of aching feet and a hollow stomach are a small price to pay considering what was developing under that lid with each passing minute." [bit.ly/chol05]

When I came across The Great Cholent Divide, I was sure it would be a debate on the merits of bean versus potato cholent. I was flabbergasted to discover the divide is between cholent lovers and cholent haters. Author Judy Gruen is firmly situated in the latter camp. "As a card-carrying member of the anti-cholent brigade, I smugly assumed that my home would always remain a cholent-free environment. After all, I had read about the dangers of secondhand cholent, such as family members and guests falling asleep at the table before the dessert was even served. As long as I wielded the power of the pots, the pans and the mixing spoons around here, I thought I was safe." And then she heard the dreaded question from her children. "Why don't you ever make cholent?" Does Judy cave? Draw your own conclusions when she says, "I began to feel that I was a rebellious daughter of Israel, flagrantly violating the 614th commandment: 'Thou shalt make cholent!'" [bit.ly/chol06]

Next week, we make cholent.

Research shows circumcision can help prevent AIDS

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Research spearheaded by Dr. Stephen Moses of the University of Manitoba has found that circumcision among men who participate in heterosexual sex greatly reduces their risk of contracting HIV/AIDS.

Moses recently received national recognition when his findings were listed as one of the top Canadian achievements in health research in 2009 by the Canadian Institute of Health Research and the Canadian Medical Association Journal.

Although scientists had suspected that circumcision was one way to help prevent HIV, Moses' randomized clinical trials offered conclusive experimental proof to support this claim.

The project, originally started in 2001 in Kenya, where HIV infections have been widespread, involved more than 2,700 men, and was ongoing for five years. The findings of the study showed that those circumcised had a 55 per cent less chance of being infected with HIV/AIDS while having heterosexual intercourse, compared to uncircumcised men. Moses' clinical trials ended early when it was determined that the results were already so compelling that it was unethical to continue the trials without offering the control group the protection of circumcision.

Moses, 57, who is a physician, a medical microbiology professor and a public health specialist, collaborated with researchers from the United States and Nairobi to conduct his study.

"Since foreskin on the male penis has many receptor cells, circumcision makes it less likely that HIV will be contracted," he told The CJN.

The study, in conjunction with two other studies showing that circumcision reduced the chances of HIV infection, was named by Time magazine in 2007 as one of the years' top medical breakthroughs.

Moses' findings will have the greatest impact in regions where HIV infection rates are high and rates of male circumcision are low, including several countries in eastern and southern Africa.

"In these areas, it could take as few as 19 circumcisions to prevent one person from contracting HIV," the Toronto native said. "Doing more male circumcisions over a period of years in those countries... could result in a reduction in HIV prevalence in the general population by as much as 67 per cent," he added.

When asked whether his being Jewish was a factor in his taking an interest in studying the connection between circumcision and HIV prevention, Moses answered, "No, not really. It was more that I was with a research group from U of M, which I joined while I was in Kenya in 1989."

Moses, who moved to Winnipeg in 1989, noted that the group of researchers was already interested in the topic of male circumcision and HIV infection.

After the results of Moses' study were made public, male circumcision was endorsed as a preventive measure by the World Health Organization and the Joint United Nations Program on HIV/AIDS (UNAIDS).

Dr. Stephen Moses

In March 2007, these organizations wrote: "The efficacy of male circumcision in reducing female to male transmission of HIV has been proven beyond reasonable doubt." They went on to recommend that "promoting male circumcision should be recognized as an additional, important strategy for the prevention of heterosexually acquired HIV infection in men."

Moses said that "already this year, in one area in Kenya where circumcision is traditionally not performed, there have been 50,000 circumcisions. The goal is to do 100,000 circumcisions there a year for the next few years."

When asked about HIV rates and the Jewish community, Moses said that within the Jewish community of North America, those most likely to become infected with HIV are "gay men and intravenous drug users."

Get ready for healthy homemade bread

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

When I saw the title Healthy Bread in Five Minutes a Day, I was intrigued. Healthy eating is at the top of the list of most people's New Year's resolutions, but January also brings long, cold nights, a desire to hibernate and a craving for carb-loaded comfort foods such as bread and chocolate.

Healthy Bread in Five Minutes a Day: 100 New Recipes Featuring Whole Grains, Fruits, Vegetables and Gluten-Free Ingredients (Thomas Dunne Books), was co-authored by Jeff Hertzberg, M.D. and pastry chef Zoë François. Their first bread-baking book, Artisan Breads in Five Minutes a Day, has sold over 200,000 copies, with rave reviews.

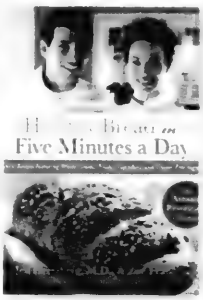
In their latest book, Hertzberg and François took their simple, super-fast technique and adapted it for the health-conscious bread-baker. Their secret is to mix up a big batch of super-moist yeast dough that takes just five minutes of active preparation time, store it in the refrigerator, cut off portions as needed over the next week or so, then shape and bake. You'll find recipes for Black and White Braided Pumpernickel/Rye, 100 per cent Whole Wheat Bread, Garlic Knots with Olive Oil, Braided Challah with Whole Wheat and Wheat Germ, and Chocolate Espresso Whole Wheat Bread (below). Many of the recipes are 100 per cent whole grain.

The authors have also included several gluten-free breads and pastries, along with helpful information about unfamiliar ingredients. Gluten-Free Olive Oil Bread can be baked as a free-form loaf with a crispy crust, or can be transformed into pizza with a crust that tastes like the real thing.

The authors answer bread questions at their website, www.healthybreadinfive.com.

This book will show you that there is time enough for home-baked bread, and that it can be part of a healthy diet. Whether you are looking for more whole grains, watching your weight, trying to reduce your cholesterol, or just care about what goes into your body, this book is a must-have. Enjoy in good health!

CHOCOLATE ESPRESSO WHOLE WHEAT BREAD



"I was so pleased when the nutritional powers that be deemed dark chocolate and espresso 'good for you.' Considering what a large portion of my diet they occupy, I was relieved to know I no longer needed to feel guilty, not that I ever really had. So, in an attempt to make you all a bit healthier and a lot happier I've come up with Chocolate Espresso Bread. Not too sweet but packed with flavour." –Zoë François

Makes enough dough for at least two 2-pound loaves. The recipe is easily doubled or halved. Use any leftover dough to make cupcakes (below).

2 cups whole wheat flour
4 cups unbleached all-purpose flour
1 cup cocoa powder
1 1/2 tbsp. granulated yeast, or 2 packets
1 tbsp. kosher salt (increase or decrease to taste)
1 4 cup vital wheat gluten (e.g., Bob's Red Mill)
1 cup lukewarm brewed espresso or strong coffee
1 1/4 cups lukewarm water
4 large eggs
1/2 cup neutral-flavoured oil
3/4 cup honey
6 oz. bittersweet chocolate, finely chopped egg wash (1 egg beaten with 1 tbsp. water) for brushing on top crust raw sugar for sprinkling on top

Mixing and storing the dough: Whisk together the flours, cocoa powder, yeast, salt and vital wheat gluten in a 5-quart bowl or a lidded (not airtight) food container.

Combine the liquid ingredients and the chopped chocolate, and mix with the dry ingredients without kneading, using a spoon, a 14-cup food processor (with dough attachment), or a heavy-duty stand mixer (with paddle). You might need to use wet hands to get the last bit of flour to incorporate if you're not using a machine. The dough will be loose, but it will firm up when chilled. Don't try to use it without chilling at least 2 hours.

Cover (not airtight), and allow the dough to rest at room temperature until it rises and collapses (or flattens on top), approximately 2 hours.

Refrigerate it in a lidded (not airtight) container and use over the next 5 days. Beyond that, the dough stores well in the freezer for up to 2 weeks in an airtight container. Freeze it in 2-pound portions. When using frozen dough, thaw it in the refrigerator for 24 hours before use, then allow the usual rest-rise time.

On baking day, grease an 8-1/2 x 4-1/2-inch nonstick loaf pan. Dust the surface of the refrigerated dough with flour and cut off a 2-pound (cantaloupe-size) piece. Dust the piece with more flour and quickly shape it into a ball by stretching the surface of the dough around to the bottom on all four sides, rotating the ball a quarter-turn as you go.

Elongate the ball into an oval and place it into the loaf pan; your goal is to fill the pan about three-quarters full. Cover loosely with plastic wrap and allow to rest and rise for 1 hour 45 minutes.

Thirty minutes before baking time, preheat the oven to 350, with a rack placed in the centre of the oven. If you're not using a baking stone in the oven, a 5-minute preheat is adequate. Steam is not needed.

Just before baking, Use a pastry brush to brush the loaf's top crust with egg wash, and then sprinkle with the raw sugar.

Bake near the centre of the oven for approximately 45 to 50 minutes, until firm. Remove the bread from the pan and allow it to cool on a rack before slicing and eating.

גידי קורן וחברים

חלק לא קטן בתיאוריה של דארווין מבוסס על תצפיות שעשה באיי גאלאפאגוס, שנמצאים כשעה טיסה מחופי אקואדור. שם ראה דארווין חיות מאותו זן שהתפתחו עם השנים בצורה שונה על האיים השונים, והוא הסיק שמוכרחה היתה להיות סיבה גנטית לשינויים, כתגובה לסביבה השונה בכל אי.

יש בטורונטו משרד נסיעות שמתמחה בגאלאפאגוס, וקלודט התגלתה כמומחית בינלאומית (4164139090) אבל שישאר בינינו.

תארו לעצמכם מה היה קורה לאמריקה אם האיומים ופעולות הטרור נגד מדינת היהודים היו מקבלות הסבה לארצות-הברית של דודנו סם.

Students to 'explore Jewishness' in Chicago

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

For Aaron Vomberg, spring break isn't just about parties, sunshine and expensive resorts. It's about bringing people together.

Vomberg, the vice-president of programming at the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS), is working with National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL) on CFJS's first annual winter symposium for leadership and social justice.

The symposium, which takes place in Chicago from Feb. 16 to 21, will focus on teaching leadership skills and merging them with volunteerism and social action. Participants will be hosted by Spertus College and will be involved in lectures and discussions, as well as volunteer work in Chicago's less fortunate areas. They'll also earn a leadership certificate from the college.

"It's very important to maintain a network of strong, large communities across North America," Vomberg, who is also a student at Dalhousie University, said.

For Vomberg, the concepts of leadership and social action are intertwined.

"Social action serves as a good mechanism for… attracting and maintaining good leaders," he said. "It also teaches good fundamentals surrounding leadership. Social action opportunities really bring people together."

Vomberg, 22, knows the importance of promoting social awareness and volunteerism. The urban planning and development student was president of Hillel at Dalhousie University and involved with Habitat for Humanity. He later got involved with CFJS and went to Israel with the group.

"When I got involved, it was kind of one of my personal goals to… promote this idea of tikkun olam," he said.

While students will be focusing on a variety of subjects during their time at Spertus College, they will also participate in hands-on experiences.

"We're not just focusing on advocacy and identity-based issues – it will be directly intertwined with tikkun olam," Vomberg said. "This could involve working through food banks and homeless shelters. It's going to carry a significant load of our time there."

The symposium, which organizers hope to hold in different cities every year, took around two years to develop.

"There seems to be a lack of opportunities to bring students from across Canada together. We were aiming to fill that void," Vomberg said.

"We've explored a variety of different opportunities. We created this objective with… different goals in mind, one of the goals involves making these opportunities meaningful but accessible."

This means making the symposium both geographically and financially accessible for participants. The trip will cost about $500 per student, said Samuel Konig, the national director of NJCL.

"Wherever you're from, we wanted to make it a trip which is feasible economically," he said. "We realize that students are working and going to school. We're trying to just be realistic."

Konig sees the trip as an important opportunity for Canada's undergraduate students.

"This is at a critical age. [You can] explore your Jewishness [and] explore who you are," he said. "It's an opportunity to forge relationships."

Konig hopes the symposium will act as a networking exercise.

"This is the place to do it – to come up with ideas and initiatives," he said, adding that the free time between activities may prove the most useful.

"It's during your dinners, your social time, during Shabbat. It's about creating that forum, a safe place for Jewish students to come together… This will make them grow."

Students will be selected through an application process to participate in the symposium. While Jewish undergraduate students throughout Canada can apply, only 15 will be chosen.

"We want to make it selective, we want to really attract a certain group. It's a prestigious thing," Konig said.

The trip's organizers are looking for students with some leadership experience who are involved in the Jewish community. While the symposium's target audience is undergraduate students, graduates may apply as well.

"It's a diverse trip, we want a diverse crowd," Konig said.

Students can apply online at www.students4israel.ca/cfjs-chicago-trip by Jan. 10.

Educator fought for teachers' rights

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Veteran Jewish educator Freda Steinberg began teaching at Beth Tzedec Congregation in 1952 and worked there for most of the rest of her life, until she was forced to stop in November for health reasons.

Steinberg died of cancer Dec. 14 at Baycrest's palliative care unit. She was 78.

A founder of United Synagogue Day School, she was on staff most recently at Beth Tzedec Congregational School, teaching reading to students who were having difficulty, Jennifer Turack, director of education and family programming at the synagogue, told The CJN.

"She was devoted to the cause," said Turack. "Her goal was always that [students] should walk away learning something."

A founder of the Federation of Teachers in Hebrew Schools in the 1970s and its former co-president, Steinberg is remembered for her involvement in the organization, which functioned as a union for Jewish educators.

"She had a strong sense of justice and felt that Jewish educators should be compensated and protected," said Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl in a eulogy.

He told The CJN that Steinberg was "part of a generation of educators who fought very hard for a place [and] to create respectability for Jewish teachers."

Steinberg and the union fought for Jewish day school and supplementary teachers to have the right to a contract and to collective bargaining, said Jack Lipinsky, who teaches at United Synagogue Day School.

"I never met anyone like her," Lipinsky told The CJN. "She was like one of these people you read about in the newspapers, a union organizer. She was an incredibly devoted person for the rights of Hebrew educators.

"Her basic premise was that teachers had to be held in higher esteem in the community." In addition to rights, she also believed that teachers had to earn respect through proper training and "professionalization," he said.

As well, Lipinsky recalls, Steinberg was a great lover of opera and theatre.

Freda Steinberg

A Toronto native who grew up in an Orthodox home, Steinberg, who never married, studied early childhood education at the University of Toronto's Institute of Child Study, and later at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York.

Aaron Nussbaum – the first director of education at United Synagogue Day School, of which Steinberg was a founder – met her in 1948 at a convention of Hashomer Hadati (now Bnei Akiva), the religious Zionist youth movement.

She was the first director of Camp Arrowhead, on Lake Simcoe, for at least 10 years after it was founded in 1955, said her niece RoAnne Leneck, of Los Angeles.

Working in the same building in the early 1960s, Nussbaum got to know Steinberg as a teacher who was "very devoted to the kids, to the school and to the program."

Before USDS opened in 1961 at Beth Tzedec, Steinberg was involved in founding and then teaching at the synagogue's "Foundation School" in the mid-1950s, Nussbaum said.

He explained that "the idea in those days was to go to Foundation School from nursery until Grade 2, and then go to public school."

Steinberg was predeceased by a sister, Helen Aron. She is survived by her nieces and nephew RoAnne, Brian and Danielle Leneck and Shawna Aron.

MONTREAL — Few people had a chance to see the Dec. 18 obituary for Mayer Schondorf in the Gazette, because it appeared only once.

But word-of-mouth and e-mail were enough to fill Paperman & Sons funeral home the same day for a rare 8:30 a.m. funeral for Schondorf, a prominent Holocaust survivor who died suddenly from a massive stroke the previous day at age 81.

Schondorf's body was flown to Israel after Shabbat for burial, but at Paperman's, the disproportionately high number of young people was a telling indication of the respect and affection they had for him.

Schondorf and his wife, Rena, also a Holocaust survivor, were reliable presences, linked arm-in-arm, on Israel Experience's annual March of the Living trip to Poland and Israel for high school students.

They participated in the march seven times, most recently last spring.

"His impact on young people was two-fold," Rabbi Reuben Poupko, one of two rabbis who delivered eulogies at the funeral, told The CJN. "The first was his ability to tell his story in a moving and compelling way. The second was his character, his bearing and personality, the way he was with young people. He was an inspiration."

That echoed the sentiments of Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz of Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem synagogue, who also delivered a eulogy.

Mayer Schondorf

Schondorf and his wife "insisted on accompanying the March of the Living… because they saw stories about Holocaust denial and understood the need to tell their story. They needed to be a link to another era," Rabbi Steinmetz said.

"The marchers were automatically drawn to Mayer and Rena… [because] Mayer was not only telling them how he survived, but also why he survived. He wanted to recreate a Jewish life, a Jewish world."

The gentlemanly and amiable Schondorf and his spouse were also active in transmitting the legacy of the Holocaust to non-Jews, said Alice Herscovitch, executive director of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre (MHMC).

Herscovitch said the Schondorfs, besides addressing audiences during the centre's annual Holocaust Education Series and speaking to hundreds of Jewish and non-Jewish students during the school year, also spoke to a group of young Rwandans only two months ago.

"There are no elders in their community [due to the Rwandan genocide], Herscovitch said. "He told them how it was possible to build their lives again."

She added that Schondorf also played a role in developing the MHMC museum and served as a docent there.

Schondorf is survived by his wife Rena Leinkram, son Ronald, daughter Debbie Eisenberg, 10 grandchildren and six great-grandchildren.

Pope Benedict practices delicate Jewish dance

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
JTA

ROME — For at least the third time in his papacy, Pope Benedict's XVI is doing the Jewish dance that takes him one step back, one step forward.

The step back came when Benedict made a move in mid-December to bring Holocaust-era Pope Pius XII a bit closer to sainthood. The step forward will come in mid-January, when Benedict visits Rome's main synagogue – a trip planned long before Benedict's move on Pius.

The question is what impact the visit will have on ruffled Catholic-Jewish relations.

"It is an important event, a milestone in the dialogue," Rome's chief rabbi, Riccardo Di Segni, told Vatican Radio about the planned synagogue visit. "We have great expectations for what it can mean in terms of the general climate."

"If we stop at the things that divide us deeply, we won't get anywhere," he said. "The differences are important to move forward."

Benedict's visit – set to take place Jan. 17, the Catholic Church's annual Day of Dialogue with Judaism – will come a month after he recognized the religiously defined "heroic virtues" of both John Paul II and Pius XII, putting them one step away from beatification.

The Polish-born John Paul made fostering Catholic-Jewish relations a hallmark of his papacy. But critics have long accused Pius of having turned a blind eye to Jewish suffering during the Holocaust. The Vatican and other supporters say Pius acted behind the scenes to help Jews.

Gary Krupp, a Jew and the head of Pave the Way, a non-sectarian foundation that promotes interfaith dialogue, suggested in a recent opinion piece in the New York Post that criticism of Pius XII began in the 1960s as part of a Soviet smear campaign against the Catholic Church, which at the time was profoundly anti-Communist. The Anti-Defamation League responded with a call on the pope to disregard Krupp's "flawed" evidence.

Scholars and Jewish organizations for years have called on the Vatican to fully open its secret archives in order to clarify the issue before Pius is moved any further toward sainthood. Benedict's decision to green-light Pius's advance drew widespread criticism from Jewish bodies. While many Jewish organizational leaders said it was up to the Vatican to decide whom to honour with sainthood, they renewed calls for the archives to be opened.

"As long as the archives of Pope Pius about the crucial period 1939 to 1945 remain closed, and until a consensus on his actions – or inaction – concerning the persecution of millions of Jews in the Holocaust is established, a beatification is inopportune and premature," the World Jewish Congress' president, Ronald Lauder, said in a statement.

The Vatican responded with a conciliatory statement, saying Benedict's move was in no way "a hostile act towards the Jewish people" and should not be considered "an obstacle on the path of dialogue between Judaism and the Catholic Church."

The uproar over Pius XII is not the first episode in which the Vatican had to backpedal, clarify or explain a Pope Benedict decision that angered Jews.

In 2008, Jewish protests over the reinstatement of a Good Friday Latin prayer that appeared to call for the conversion of the Jews led the Vatican to change some of the prayer's wording. Still, Italian rabbis were so angry over the issue that they boycotted participation in last year's Jan. 17 Day of Dialogue with Judaism.

One year ago, the Pope's lifting of a 1988 excommunication order against Richard Williamson, a renegade Bishop who turned out to be a Holocaust denier, sparked outrage among political figures and mainstream Catholics as well as Jews. Bishop Williamson was one of four bishops rehabilitated as part of the Pope's effort to bring their ultra-conservative movement, the Society of St. Pius X, back into the mainstream Catholic fold.

The Vatican ordered Bishop Williamson to recant and admitted that the Pope had not been aware of his views, despite a video of Williamson that was widely circulated on YouTube.

The Pope himself issued a strong message of support to a visiting delegation from the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations and announced to the group the plans for his May 2009 visit to Israel, his first to the Jewish state as pontiff.

Analysts said Benedict's move on Pius is part of the Pope's effort to shore up conservative forces within the church.

"The Pope apparently has chosen to balance his unquestionable commitment to the Catholic Church's good relations with world Judaism with his commitment to recuperating the religious right wing of Catholicism," said Lisa Palmieri Billig, the American Jewish Committee's liaison to the Vatican. "Obviously his path is strewn with warring obstacles."

Rabbi Gary Bretton-Granatoor, an expert in interfaith relations and the vice-president of the World Union for Progressive Judaism, said, "The great struggle of this moment is shoring up the most traditional elements of his church as he fights the growing secularization and Islamification of the European stage, which is right before his eyes."

Rabbi Bretton-Granatoor said that the visit to the shul in Rome is "far more telling about the state of Catholic-Jewish relations" than the move to elevate Pius.

Jordan waging 'lawfare' with Dead Sea Scrolls request

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Jordan is waging "lawfare" against Israel by trying to prevent the return of the Dead Sea Scrolls from Canada to the Jewish state, an Israeli strategic analyst asserted earlier this week.

There has been no particular cooling of relations or notable difficulties between Jordan and Israel, which signed a peace treaty in 1994, said Prof. Efraim Inbar, director of the Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies at Bar-Ilan University. "The relationship is just the usual. This is part of the usual."

"In Israel nobody pays attention to [the Jordanian claim]. It's ridiculous," he said. "[The scrolls] clearly [belong] to the Jewish People.

"They [Jordan] want jurisdiction over the West Bank," but their jurisdiction was recognized by only two countries, he said. "They are trying to make trouble. Their strategy is to delegitimize Israel's connection to the Land of Israel."

CBC reported on the weekend that the government of Canada turned down the Jordanian request.

The scrolls were exhibited at the Royal Ontario Museum beginning in June and ending Jan. 3. Thousands viewed the 2,000-year-old artifacts, which were written primarily in Hebrew and Aramaic and were found in caves near the ancient Essene community of Qumran.

A little over two weeks ago, Jordan, citing a 1954 Hague Convention, asked the government of Canada to seize the scrolls and prevent their return to Israel, which has custody of the historic items.

Jordan accuses Israel of taking the scrolls from a museum in Jerusalem in 1967 when Israel captured the eastern part of the city during the Six Day War. The scrolls had been found by Bedouins in caves on the northwest shore of the Dead Sea, an area under Jordanian control from 1948 to 1967. However, only two countries recognized Jordan's jurisdiction and the Palestinian leadership of the day rejected a UN partition resolution which would have given them sovereignty over the lands where the scrolls were found.

Moshe Ronen, chair of the Canada Israel Committee (CIC), said in a Twitter update that Jordan long ago relinquished its claim to the West Bank and it therefore "has no legal basis or authority for its request."

He noted that under the Oslo Accords, which Jordan witnessed, Israel was to remain custodian of the scrolls and their ultimate ownership was to be negotiated between Israel and the Palestinians.

"This is in effect a ploy aimed at delegitimizing the Jewish aboriginal claim to Israel, for which the scrolls are a living testament," Ronen said.

The Israeli embassy in Ottawa declined to comment, but in Israel, Foreign Ministry spokesperson Yigal Palmor called Jordan's claim ridiculous.

"The Dead Sea Scrolls are an intrinsic part of Jewish heritage and religion. The scrolls have no relation to Jordan or the Jordanian people," he said.

"Jordan's occupation of the West Bank was never recognized by the international community, and the kingdom relinquished all claims on the territories back in the 1980s. On what grounds are they trying to lay claims to the scrolls, which are a cornerstone of Jewish cultural history?" he asked.

Israel's population 7.5 million

Israel's population at the end of 2009 stood at 7,509,000. The Central Bureau of Statistics released the figures in advance of the new year. According to the bureau, 75.4 per cent of the population is Jewish. 20.3 per cent is Arab and 4.3 per cent is classified as "other" – either non-Arab Christians or those without a religious designation. Israel's population grew 1.8 per cent in 2009, with 160,000 births and 39,000 deaths.

Hebrew Day to be marked

Israel's cabinet is set to make the birthday of Eliezer Ben-Yehuda, the father of modern Hebrew, National Hebrew Day. The recommendation must still pass the ministerial committee for symbols and ceremonies. In a meeting Sunday, the cabinet set up a committee to urge ways to strengthen the language in everyday use. Ideas floated by the cabinet include establishing a team to maintain the language, a Hebrew conference, a national medal, and stamps, Ynet reported.

Sharon in coma for 4 years

Ariel Sharon's family and friends marked the fourth anniversary of the former prime minister's massive stroke. Sharon, now 81, never regained consciousness after his Jan. 4, 2006 stroke. He remains in a coma, although he breathes on his own. He lives in a long-term care facility in Ra'anana and is visited frequently by family and friends, reports said. Sharon, elected prime minister as head of the Likud party in 2001, suffered the stroke several months after overseeing Israel's pullout from Gaza. He formed the new centrist Kadima party to run in the 2006 elections. Doctors say it's unlikely he'll come out of the coma.

'Time has come to enact sanctions'

Cotler is one of more than 60 petition signatories, including Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel; former Swedish deputy prime minister and expert on genocide, Per Ahlmark; Darfur survivor and Sudanese member of parliament, Salih Mahmoud Osman; leading Egyptian democracy advocate Saad Edin Ibrahim, and former Israeli MK and human rights advocate Amnon Rubenstein.

Canadians signatories include former prime minister John Turner; former foreign affairs minister Lloyd Axworthy, and a specialist in international law, Prof. Fayam Acavam.

A significant number of Canadian signatories are of Iranian descent. "The signatories to the petition are not mainly Jewish. Many are non-Jewish, members of the Iranian diaspora, and leading figures in the Arab and Muslim worlds," Cotler said.

"It's one thing for me to endorse this petition. It's another thing for an Iranian Canadian to do so."

The 156-page document, called The Danger of a Nuclear, Genocidal and Rights-Violating Iran: The Responsibility to Prevent, is split into two parts. The first part offers evidence of the state's transgressions: its nuclear weapons program, its state-sanctioned incitement to genocide and its domestic human rights violations.

The second part is a 12-point "road map" on how to remedy the situation. Each point deals with different types of sanctions, including those that could be imposed through domestic and international law and diplomatic measures, as well as sanctions that are economic and investment-related.

"[This petition] is the most comprehensive and compelling witness testimony and documentary evidence ever released on the nature of the Iranian threat, and it's the most detailed set of recommendations for action by the international community," Cotler said.

The list of violations, aside from those related to the nuclear program, includes widespread killing and torture, assault on women's rights, detention and murder of political dissidents, coerced confessions, show trials, demonization of Israel, Holocaust denial and rampant anti-Semitism, as well as an assault on the Baha'i, a religious minority targeted for special oppression by the regime.

An Interpol arrest warrant is out for the Iranian Revolutionary Guard corps' minister of defence, Ahmed Wahidi, who is alleged to have headed the attack on the Jewish community centre in Buenos, Aires, Argentina in 1994.

Irwin Cotler

"You have this absurdly Orwellian act, where a person involved in international terrorism has been appointed defence minister," Cotler said.

The petition outlines several sanctions aimed at making it harder for Iran to produce nuclear weapons, weakening the Iranian Revolutionary Guard, and prohibiting private companies such as Nokia to facilitate domestic repression. Nokia provides the Guard with surveillance equipment.

One of the sanctions targets gasoline and petroleum imports. Although Iran is the second-largest exporter of oil, it imports some 40 per cent of its gas. "This is their Achilles heel, a major economic vulnerability," Cotler said.

He said the "time has come to enact sanctions. It cannot just be a declaratory response. [The petition] is not a policy request. It outlines the legal obligations of the international community. The rights of the Iranian people are under attack and the international community must assume its legal responsibilities.

"Iran is at a tipping point now in respect to regime change. It is the responsibility of the international community to not stand idly by and permit the Revolutionary Guard to assault the Iranian green movement," Cotler said, referring to ongoing anti-government demonstrations in Iran.

He said Canada is in a strategic position to promote the petition. Canada, more than any other country in the world, is involved in international political and economic decision-making bodies such as the UN Security Council, he said. "Canada takes multilateralism seriously. Canada has a special role to play because of these involvements."

He added that international law is a "centrepiece" of Canadian foreign policy, and the petition draws heavily upon international law.

Canada always speaks of itself as having a "human rights foreign policy" and human rights is another organizing theme of the petition, Cotler said. "Human rights is part of the Canadian DNA."

Muslims rally on Facebook against anti-Semitism

JTA

NEW YORK — Muslims placed personal messages against anti-Semitism on the Facebook page of a Canadian Muslim reformist and author.

The hundreds of personal messages on Irshad Manji's Facebook fan page were a thank you to the European Union of Jewish Students for the group's statement earlier in the month condemning the Swiss vote to ban minarets in Switzerland.

Following the Dec. 2 EUJS statement, Manji, the New York-based author of The Trouble with Islam Today: A Muslim's Call for Reform in Her Faith and the producer of the Emmy-nominated film Faith Without Fear, asked her Muslim fans to post personal statements against anti-Semitism.

"The move by Irshad Manji and EUJS has shown how successful and meaningful the Jewish and Muslim connection can be on a grassroots level. We hope that this connection is only the beginning of a springboard for further dialogue, co-operation and collaboration between Jewish and Muslim groups," read a statement from EUJS in its December newsletter.

Haredi conversion rabbi resigns under cloud

By YAIR ETTINGER
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

TEL AVIV — A haredi organization that describes itself as a standard-bearer in the fight "to protect the Jewish people and sincerely committed converts from fraudulent or unacceptable conversions" is finding itself in an embarrassing situation as its founder and former head faces allegations of sexual impropriety.

Rabbi Leib Tropper, who resigned from the group Eternal Jewish Family in early December, is alleged to have promised to smooth the conversion of a woman in exchange for sexual favours.

A report in the New York Post late last month said that "a prominent Orthodox rabbi has been caught on tape discussing his apparent love affair with a [woman] he was converting to Judaism."

The woman involved is 32-year-old Shannon Orand of Houston, who still seeks to convert from Christianity to Judaism. The bulk of the report deals with embarrassing comments made in a phone call, during which the rabbi was allegedly recorded demanding Orand perform sexual services for him and his friends in exchange for helping her to secure a conversion certificate.

Only at the very end of the Post story is it mentioned that at the start of December, the Monsey, N.Y.-based Rabbi Tropper resigned from his position as head of Eternal Jewish Family, which promotes halachic conversions.

Rabbi Tropper's stated goal in founding Eternal Jewish Family was to "fortify the walls of conversion," amid an ideological debate between the haredi and national camps in Israel. While functioning as a well-known rabbi in New York and head of the Kol Yaakov yeshiva, Rabbi Tropper enlisted wealthy Jews in a fight against non-haredi conversions, especially those carried out by special conversion courts in Israel headed by Rabbi Haim Druckman.

The doors of senior haredi officials were thrown open to him, including those of Rabbi Shalom Elyashiv, a leader of the Lithuanian haredi sect. Rabbi Tropper himself also had the title of gaon ("most learned") bestowed upon him by the haredi press, all because of his efforts against conversions by Israel's Conversion Authority and the "infiltration" of gentiles into the People of Israel.

When news of his alleged affair broke last month, posters denouncing Rabbi Tropper were plastered across the haredi city of Bnei Brak. Its title said: "Leave impurity." The text's anonymous authors threatened that if he didn't quit the group, "We will publicize our voice aloud, accompanied by pornographic pictures and shocking video clips."

The rabbi did announce his resignation, but he failed to hush up the affair.

It was leaked to U.S. Jewish bloggers, audio was posted on YouTube and the Post ran its story, under the headline "Tal-mood for love: Sex-tape rabbi tries to 'share' hottie," referring to one of the rabbi's alleged demands on the tape.

Couple out of hospital after South Africa attack

Compiled by CJN Staff

Martin and Janet Stern, the Toronto couple who were attacked and robbed Dec. 22 while hiking in South Africa, are recovering from their injuries after being released from hospital.

The South African natives, who moved to Canada in 1986, were stoned, stabbed, tied up with shoelaces and left bleeding in a remote area during a robbery.

The two attackers robbed the Sterns of Janet's engagement ring, as well as watches, cellphones and a digital camera.

Speaking to South African reporters, Stern, an investment adviser and first vice-president of CIBC Wood Gundy, told reporters they nodded to the men as they passed them on a hiking trail in the Fernkloof Nature Reserve, located in the Hermanus mountains about 150 kilometres from Cape Town, and the pair then returned and attacked them from behind.

"The next thing we knew, we were being stabbed in the back. I was stabbed next to my kidney, and they stabbed Janet in the arm," he said.

A sign at the entrance to the reserve warned visitors that due to recent attacks to be vigilant, and not to carry valuables on hikes, including passports and credit cards. Martin Stern said the couple had not seen the warning, and would have avoided the area if they had.

He said that during the attack, his wife said to him in Hebrew, "'We're going to pray to God' and then they left us."

The Sterns have made annual visits to the Cape Town area, where Martin Stern was born and where his wife's parents live, for the last 10 years or so. He told local media that they were overwhelmed by the treatment they received after the attack and would continue to visit South Africa.

The attack made front-page news across the country as it prepares to host the 2010 soccer World Cup.

Michigan-Israel group forged

"Going forward, Michigan will always be an automotive state – people are looking at hybrid vehicles and electrical vehicles and have put a stake in the ground worth a billion dollars of federal funding," said Perry, who is a consultant on water technologies, biotech, clean tech and security.

Some $1.3 billion in U.S. federal stimulus money has been channelled into batteries to make Michigan the battery manufacturing capital of the world. Dow Chemical is getting into batteries, Perry said, adding that its batteries that will bring Michigan and Israel together.

"We've made a call out to Israel – to many Israeli companies and researchers in universities developing advanced battery technology for vehicles, energy storage and energy conversion.

"These are all things the state of Michigan and its universities are seeking. There are Israeli companies that are developing the infrastructure for electric vehicles, such as Better Place and ETV, that are developing new engines for the electric vehicle world," Perry said.

Israel's ETV Motors recently raised $12 million to fuel its engine, described by USA Today as "a jet engine for a Toyota Prius."

The Michigan-Israel group has also connected with Prof. Doron Aurbach of Bar Ilan University's department of chemistry. Aurbach is a leader in the battery storage field. He collaborates with key players at other Israeli universities, including Tel Aviv University (which developed the battery storage company Enstorage) and the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology.

The Michigan Israel Bridge has developed two forums over the last couple of years that have led to some concrete business exchanges.

One exchange led to a partnership with a Michigan organization called Automation Alley, which connected Michigan businesses – OEM and others – to Israeli companies.

It was accomplished "speed-dating style," said Perry, who won't divulge specifics about the partnerships forged until the companies announce details.

"Customers sales were made, as were new customer acquisitions and a couple of strategic alliances between Michigan and Israeli companies," he said. "We are helping them to further develop their business.

"Even though they have been selling to Detroit, historically [Israeli companies] have a hard time getting their foot in the door. Many of these companies have for years been trying to get to the right business development people, even if they have local reps. We've helped open doors for some companies who weren't able to open them before."

Some of Israel's automotive technology comes from the military and telecom industries and includes Raval, a company based in the Negev Desert near Sde Boker. Raval supplies fuel-tank systems for cars to prevent fuel reflux.

Another Israeli company working with America is Mivrag from the Galilee region, which supplies cold-formed metal parts to companies, among them GM, Volkswagen, Delphi and Opel. There is also Tadir-Gan, which provides precision-moulded aluminum parts.

Some Israeli companies have been unsuccessful in entering the U.S. market.

MobilEye, which has commercialized military technology to provide warnings for safe lane departures on runways, has been having difficulties transforming its technology to the automotive industry for fleet safety, Perry said.

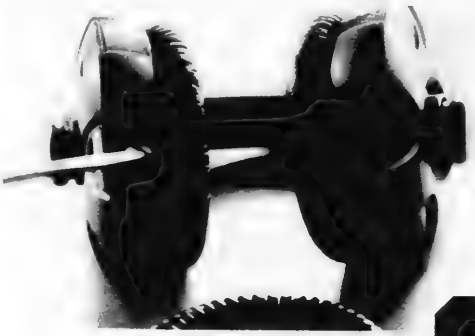
Entrepreneur is a DJ of all trades

By EZRA GLINTER
Special to The CJN

When Abby Tobias was 15, he wanted to be the next Jim Carrey.

But one night Corey Mandel, the owner of a local DJ company, spotted him performing standup comedy at an open mike night, and offered Tobias a job.



From then on, Tobias knew he had found his real calling.

"I was always a jokester, but also very passionate about music," Tobias said. "So the DJ business was really my first business. At the time, you would make $50 a night, and at comedy no money, so it seemed like an amazing thing... And I was never very good at standup."

Soon Tobias was performing at weddings and bar mitzvahs, as well as bringing his skills as a turntableist into the clubs. But as much as he loved performing, he discovered that he also had a natural entrepreneurial spirit.

Today, the 31-year-old Toronto native is not only a DJ himself, but also manages DJs and other artists, owns a club, an event production company and runs Canada's first DJ school, the Scratch Lab DJ Institute.

Tobias' career as an entertainment entrepreneur got off the ground when he was only 17 and still a student at Thornlea Secondary School. He was managing the Boogie Brats, one of Canada's premier break-dance teams. By the time he was 20 years old, he had travelled the world with them, including a stint touring with Missy Elliot, and had helped three of their members join Cirque du Soleil.

In the meantime, Tobias also started attending Ryerson University, where he studied radio and television broadcasting, which he managed to balance with his budding professional career.

"I was never very scholarly, but it wasn't taking up enough of my time that I couldn't do it all," he said. "In my second year, I actually tried dropping out of university, but my school admissions were very supportive and were able to work around it."

When he graduated in 2003, he started his first business, Sole Power, while living in his mother's basement. An event production company, Sole Power has grown to produce close to 400 events each year, employing over 100 performers. This February, Tobias will be able to claim one of his greatest successes with Sole Power– he will produce several events at the Winter Olympics in Vancouver.

In addition to running Sole Power, Tobias also manages Keys N Krates, a DJ trio that combines old-fashioned instrumentation with turntableism and live sampling, as well as the five-member group, the Eh! Team DJs.

Not content with merely performing, managing and producing events, however, Tobias started what would become his true labour of love in 2005, the Scratch Lab DJ Institute. Together with DJ Grouch and DJ Starting from Scratch, two of Canada's top DJs, he wrote the school's curriculum and began teaching both amateur and professional DJs of all ages. Today, the Scratch Lab DJ Institute is an accredited school offering a high school music credit, and has almost 2,000 students.

"It's my biggest labour of love, to be able to teach my class. We've written the rule book on how to teach DJing," Tobias said. "It's recreational, but we also have a lot of active DJs who want to be better coming to take classes."

With so many businesses to attend to, Tobias' hands are more than full.

"I'd be lying if I didn't say that my life was completely chaotic and that it's a struggle to complete my tasks for each day," he said.

Still, Tobias takes time out to help out with numerous charitable causes. Each year, Sole Power provides entertainment for the Walk With Israel, as well as for many other UJA Federation of Greater Toronto events throughout the year.

"As I've gotten more successful, it's made me want to be more charitable," he said. "I can help with expertise in certain areas, where people would otherwise have to spend substantial amounts of money."

Tobias also puts his money where his mouth is, donating to causes he cares about, including a fund he started at the Hospital for Sick Children to provide young patients with musical instruments.

"I tend to choose quite a few charities that are child related. I have a soft spot for kids, so I do what I can," he said.

Tobias' concern for kids isn't limited to hospitals. He also goes around to schools and community centres, speaking to students about his life and what makes him successful. He is modest, crediting his coworkers with much of his success, but also says that the main ingredient is hard work.

"I recognize that I definitely have the entrepreneurial spirit, but I couldn't do what I do if I didn't have amazing teams working beside me, so I can take only a certain amount of credit," he said.

"But the easiest piece of advice is to work hard. I always hear that people are grinding and hustling, when really they're sleeping until noon. You still have to be smart and make the right decisions and get lucky. But it's the type of work that everybody would want to be in, and if you're not working 12 or 14 hours a day, someone else is."

Abby Tobias, 31, found his true calling as a DJ in his teens. The Torontonian now runs the Scratch Lab DJ Institute, Canada's first school for DJs.

World music project rooted in Jewish liturgical music

Special to The CJN

The Huppah Project, like many great ideas, began accidentally.

When Toronto-based musician Aaron Lightstone got married in 2004, he naturally wanted music to play a key role in the ceremony. So he called up his friend Aviva Chernick, a well-known cantorial soloist, and asked if she would lend her voice to the day.

Added to the mix: an Indian tabla virtuoso and several other versatile world musicians who blended together to create a contemporary fusion rooted in the traditional Jewish liturgical music.

The result was even better than Lightstone could have imagined.

"I think it was very moving for me in particular, and my wife," he recalls. "But after the ceremony, there were a lot of people who came up to me and told me they felt this should be taken elsewhere and not just the wedding."

Lightstone and Chernick had already been working together musically; they had started an ensemble, Jaffa Road, shortly after meeting in 2001, which fused sacred and secular Jewish songs in English, Hebrew and Ladino.

But after witnessing the powerful response to Lightstone's wedding ceremony, the duo saw potential for a new musical endeavour.

"We started out by doing [other] weddings," says Lightstone, who also works as a music therapist, "and it developed into a concert. And then seeing as how we can't really do anything without a CD, we decided to make one."

The Huppah Project released their debut disc, Under the Canopy, earlier this year. Buoyed by Chernick's bright, diaphanous voice, the album features 13 contemporary and traditional liturgical tracks associated with the Jewish wedding ceremony, but flavoured with a blend of multicultural sounds.

Aviva Chernick and Aaron Lightstone

Standards such as Erev Shel Shoshanim are wrapped around gentle bossa nova rhythms, while the sitar, traditionally associated with Hindustani music, adds an eastern element to Heviani el beit hayayin.

Although Toronto, famed for its multiculturalism, may seem like an obvious place to spawn this type of Jewish world music movement, Lightstone insists both the Huppah Project and Jaffa Road are unique to the city, and his early influences came from overseas instead.

"The first time I heard other groups do this, particularly in Israel, I was very moved by it, both musically and spiritually," he says. "I felt I would like to be involved in something like that for a bunch of different reasons."

One of the main reasons was Lightstone's desire to connect to Judaism in a way that felt more meaningful to him.

"You had things like youth groups with particular political agendas or affiliations with particular synagogue movements that didn't really speak to me very much," he says. "I was looking for other avenues on a very esthetic musical level and was being inspired by people who had done this before us, and I thought I wanted to contribute in that way."

Something in the Huppah Project's formula appears to be working. The group recently received a Canadian Folk Music Award nomination in the World Music category at a gala held last month in Ottawa.

The significance of the nomination was not lost on Chernick or Lightstone. At a time when criticism of Israel – particularly within certain artistic circles – has never been higher, the inclusion of an all-Hebrew album felt like a triumph in itself.

"We don't wave political flags in our work purposely," says Chernick. "We just sing from the heart and what comes will come and everybody will interpret it in their own way. And yet it felt very comforting to be included, and for once, just for once, for it not to be contentious and for it to be just about the music."

Although the award went to world musician Jayme Stone, Lightstone says he feels validated by the project's success.

"There's all this potential to say, 'You know, they don't really want to hear Hebrew, they're not ready for Jewish music to be part of this bigger movement of world music,' but I think this kind of recognition really validates and confirms that if the music is good, then people will listen to it and hopefully enjoy it."

Under the Canopy is available in select Judaica stores and online at thehuppahproject.com.

KOFFLER SHOW TO OPEN IN DOWNTOWN GALLERY ON BEVERLEY STREET

A group of non-Jewish artists reflect on "the fluidity of Jewish identity in North America, taking as departure points the shared experiences of community, individuality, displacement, continuity and assimilation to examine connections and differences" in an exhibition hosted by the Koffler Gallery and set to open next week in a downtown location.

Habanot Nechama

Nikki Yanofsky

Chava Rosenfarb

Guest curator Cyril Reade has assembled the works of Rita Bakacs, Susan Lakin, Ross Racine and Allen Topolski in a show titled "how good are your dwelling places," set to go on view at 23 Beverley St. for two months beginning Jan. 14. The Koffler Centre of the Arts "is thrilled to present this unique exhibition that focuses on the heart of Jewish life – the home," said Koffler executive director Lori Starr.

Incidentally, the location is a few doors up from the childhood home of architect Frank Gehry, born Ephraim Owen Goldberg, designer of the splendidly revitalized Art Gallery of Ontario. In the old days before the Jewish community moved uptown, Beverley Street was an important address for diverse Jewish societies and organizations in the city.

Kafka story reveals unease over anti-Semitism, translator says

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Is Franz Kafka's last short story, written shortly before his premature death in 1924, a prophetic allusion to the plight of the Jews of Europe, and in particular to those who were German-speaking like him?

A new English translation of Josefine, die Sängerin oder Das Volk der Mäuse, as Josephine the Singer or The Nation of Mice, has been published by the Concordia University's Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies, as part of its Hungry I chapbook series.

The translators are Karin Doerr, a professor of German culture, language and literature at Concordia University, and Barbara Galli, who teaches at Concordia and McGill University and has expertise in religion and the arts and modern Jewish thought, with Gary Evans, a communications professor at the University of Ottawa, who has previously collaborated with Doerr, his wife, on the subjects of anti-Semitism and the Holocaust.

Doerr has written an afterword to the new translation in which she argues that Kafka's final story has a hidden Jewish subtext revealing a deep concern for the place of the Jew, and especially the Jewish artist, in gentile society. This is striking because Kafka was assimilated, had avoided Jewish references in his work, and aspired to being a great German literary figure with universal appeal before his demise at age 40. His best known work is the novella The Metamorphosis, in which a cockroach is the central character.

But, in Doerr's estimation, the Jewish history of persecution "echoes throughout" the story, which on the surface is about anthropomorphic mice in thrall to a mouse named Josephine that stands apart from the pack, who sings, or more accurately, whistles tunefully. A sense of resignation and melancholy permeates the story, as if Kafka realized the Jew will never be fully accepted by gentiles and had a premonition that Jewish life in Europe was doomed.

Other critics have read into this tale a parallel between Josephine's relatively brief glory, at least in her own mind, before she dies, to the terminally ill Kafka's review of his own artistic achievement and insecurities about how others regard what will soon become his legacy.

Doerr does not dispute that there may be truth in that, but makes a plausible case that there is more.

Doerr is well qualified to delve into the story. Not only has she translated Holocaust survivors' accounts and written on literary responses to the Shoah and on anti-Semitism in German literature, she is a scholar of how the Nazis used jargon and euphemisms to smooth over the horror of the persecution and extermination of Jews. She is the co-author 2002 Nazi-Deutsch/ Nazi-German: An English Lexicon of The Language of the Third Reich, which chillingly illustrates the many nuances of the language.

She has translated the title as Nation of the Mice rather than say, the mouse people, because that more closely matches Kafka's grammar, she says. By choosing the more formal "der Maüse," rather than Mäusevolk, he is denoting a greater formality, as befits a nation.

At this time, a Jewish sense of nationhood was gaining momentum, as the spectre of danger grew.

Moreover, Volk is a loaded word. "Anti-Semites used Volk for Jews with pejorative connotations, as with Judenvolk, meaning Jewish 'pack,' 'rabble' and the like," Doerr writes.

Kafka avoids the anti-Semitic characterization of Jews as vermin by his humanistic portrayal of the fictional mice.

"They are like ordinary people and very human in the common, affectionate sense of the word," she writes.

Even the choice of the name Josephine may have been inspired by Josefov, the old Jewish quarter in Prague, where Kafka was born, Doerr proposes.

At the launch of Josephine the Singer or The Nation of the Mice, Doerr thanked Norman Ravvin, who holds the Canadian Jewish studies chair and edits the series, for accepting the book, noting that its publication represents a rare collaboration between German and Jewish studies programs at a Canadian university.

Doerr said she hopes the new translation and analysis will make a contribution to the study of Kafka's life and work.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Model train company on the fast track to success

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"I'm nuts about trains," said Jason Shron. "When I sleep, I dream about trains. It's a lifelong interest. It takes over your life."

Though he is not necessarily an obsessive compulsive person, he is uncommonly interested in trains.

A smile crossing his bearded face, Shron said, "It's possible I have a mild case of Asperger syndrome."

With tongue in cheek, he added, "My wife will kill me if you publish this."

As founder and president of Rapido Trains Inc., Canada's largest manufacturer of model trains and accessories, Shron has good reason to be fascinated by and drawn to this universal mode of transportation.

Shron, 34, has been a train aficionado since the age of two, when he his family boarded a Canadian National Railway-Turbo train in Montreal bound for Toronto

"I was just enthralled by the whole experience, by the sounds, smells and sights," he recalled. "I fell in love with trains. Train buffs love the history and the equipment."

He established Rapido Trains in 2004, after deciding to follow his dream. Shron seemed destined for a career in academia after earning a BA degree in fine arts and an MA in art history from York University.

"I was planning to be a professor."

But a year into a PhD at the University of Birmingham, he concluded he was on the wrong track.

"I realized I was not happy. I wanted to make trains," said Shron, who travels on commercial trains as often possible, even for recreational purposes.

"I will never pass up an opportunity to ride the rails. I feel totally relaxed on a train. I love to stare out the window and watch the countryside glide by. I love to converse with strangers, and I love the physicality of the machinery."

After finding a silent financial partner and taking out a loan, he founded Rapido Trains, which now manufactures a line of products from passenger cars and cabooses to complete trains and wired telephone poles.

This year, he will start churning out stand-alone locomotives and tracks.

The model train industry is a risky one, he admits. Prior to receiving his initial order, he and his partner had already invested $500,000, not knowing with any real certainty when the first customer would come calling.

Since model trains cannot be developed in less than 12 to 18 months, Shron had to wait for about two years before he could finally ship his first order.

Much to his relief and delight, Rapido Trains has grown exponentially. In the first year, sales reached $50,000, and have since topped the $1-million mark.

Not surprisingly, the current recession has affected him to some extent. "U.S. orders are lower than they should be," he explained. "American customers have stopped ordering inventory."

In response, Shron has modified his business model and is not producing inventory anymore.

Aside from this blip, he has ridden out the slump without a major mishap.

"A lot of our American competitors have suffered," he noted. "We haven't." Indeed, advance sales of Rapido's new coach have been quite brisk.

As a manufacturer, Shron is different from his competitors in Canada and the United States in two respects. As he put it, "My models are geared for adult hobbyists. We base our models on Canadian trains."

To say he has an affinity for Canadian trains would be an understatement.

Shron was a mere toddler when he and his older brother, Greg, and their parents, Van and Sonia, boarded a Turbo train in Montreal.

In retrospect, the trip to Toronto was a turning point.

"I probably had no idea that the smell of lighter fluid, the roar of the turbines, the clunk-clunk of the single axles over the rails would change my life forever," he writes in his self-published book, TurboTrain: A Journey.

Shron fell hard for the Turbo, a sleek, light-weight, high-speed train that was commissioned in 1968 and pulled out of service in 1982.

"I drew pictures of the Turbo. I wrote stories about the Turbo. I made paper models of the Turbo. I got into scale model trains." To Shron, the Turbo was the epitome of modernity.

Shron's father, a clothing manufacturer, encouraged his son's new hobby. "He bought me my first model train set when I was four years old."

When the Turbo was terminated, Shron took its demise personally. As he observed in his book, "I cried for days. I was determined to own a model of the Turbo. I started Rapido Trains with the express aim of producing the first accurate model of the Turbo."

To ensure accuracy, Shron studied the Turbo at great length, even going to the trouble of manoeuvring his bulk under Turbo passenger cars to examine the intricate layout.

"I made sure that every detail possible was included, from the microwave in the café to the padded armrests on the coach seats."

He was certainly enamoured.

His office in Concord, Ont., is dotted with discarded red and blue Canadian National Railway coach seats. "They're extremely comfortable," he said.

Shron's model trains are designed in Concord but made in the southern Chinese city of Dongguan, a two-hour train ride from Hong Kong.

"My partner in China has been making model trains for years. A whole industry, with all the necessary skill sets, has arisen in southern China."

He chose China as his manufacturing base after discovering that Canadian companies could not meet his technical requirements.

Shron visits the plant once or twice a year, but thanks to the convenience of e-mail, he is in daily touch with his Chinese principals. "Twenty years ago, I would have had to live in China for six months of the year."

Thinking long-term, Shron began learning Mandarin three months ago. He plunged into weekly language lessons after missing a ferryboat connection in China due to his inability to read Chinese characters.

"I figure I'll be fluent in several years. Mandarin is very hard to learn. In Chinese, you have to reverse your order of thinking."

Shron hopes to expand Rapido Trains into a $3- to $5-million business within a few years.

Always the joker, he said, "I'll be able to feed my family and pay for Jewish day school. But seriously, we're doing OK. We're comfortable."

Shron's wife, the published Winnipeg-born novelist Sidura Ludwig, has been supportive. "Sidura is happy if I'm happy. She is glad I've fulfilled my dreams. She has fanned the flames of my passion since the day we met."

They have passed on their enthusiasm to their children, Nachmani Boaz, 4, and Dalya Rivka, 2.

"Boaz loves trains and Dalya is getting into it. Boaz is helping me build a slice of a 20-foot-high railway coach in our basement. It's a 25-year project. I try to work on it every morning for an hour before I go to work. It's a great way to begin a day."

Ostrich feather trade was dominated by Jews

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Ostrich feather hats were all the rage in women's fashion from the 1880s to the outbreak of World War I in 1914. "A well-dressed woman nowadays is as fluffy as a downy bird fresh from the nest," wrote an observer during that period. "If you would be fashionable, you would be beplumed."

Sarah Abrevaya Stein

Considered chic all the year round, ostrich feathers were popular millinery accoutrements for women old and young and all sizes and complexions. With at least 14 varieties and countless grades available, ostrich feathers' appeal also crossed class lines.

The trans-Atlantic ostrich feather industry was mainly in the hands of Jewish farmers, dealers, wholesalers and manufacturers, many of whom were Yiddish-speaking immigrants from the Russian Empire.

At its height, the industry was truly an international one, supplying gainful employment for entrepreneurs and workers in South Africa, the Middle East, Europe and the United States.

It is the subject of Sarah Abrevaya Stein's fascinating book, Plumes – Ostrich Feathers, Jews and a Lost World of Global Commerce, published by Yale University Press.

Drawing on a vast array of archival sources, Stein, a professor of history and Sephardi studies at the University of California in Los Angeles, has written a rigorous account of a "feather boom" that ended ingloriously with a "feather bust."

As she suggests, the feather trade originated in southern Africa, where the birds were hunted and killed for their spectacular plumes.

In general, the hunters were the indigenous inhabitants and white settlers of the area.

The ostrich – an obstreperous bird whose kick could injure or kill a handler – was domesticated in 1863 in the Western Cape district of South Africa.

By 1913, when the price of ostrich feathers reached its peak, the plumes were ranked fourth in value among South Africa's exports.

The industry, which also attracted Boer and British farmers, was centred in Oudtshoorn, a region that was deemed hospitable to ostrich farming.

Its semi-desert climate allowed feather handlers to pluck adult ostriches about every eight months and enabled farmers to easily grow alfalfa, which provided superb nourishment for the birds, says Stein.

The trade was profitable, permitting a farmer to earn five to six times more than a farmer who cultivated, say, wheat on the same plot of land.

Two additional factors contributed to its success: the existence of a cheap pool of wage labourers and the policy of the British imperial government.

The workers had the most physically taxing job, tending to the birds and plucking and sorting their feathers. In South Africa, workers of mixed races performed these roles, which were dirty and dangerous. But in North Africa, Britain and the United States, this task fell to Jews, who had experience as both artisinal and industrial workers.

The state, in South Africa at least, was essential to the industry's viability and success, building roads and railway lines that facilitated its expansion.

Interestingly enough, the European and North American side of the industry was characterized by a clear-cut division of labour.

Feather processing in London and New York was monopolized almost entirely by Ashkenazi Jews, while Sephardi Jews in these cities tended to be found in the manufacturing and wholesale sectors.

In the Middle East, wealthy Moroccan and Livornese Jewish merchants financed the conveyance of feathers to North Africa's ports via trans-Saharan camel caravans and ships plying the Red Sea and the Nile River, while working-class Jews in Cairo, Alexandria, Tripoli, Algiers, Tunis and Aden sorted and packed the feathers.

All too often, workers in the manufacturing sector toiled under sweat-shop conditions.

In New York City, for example, labourers in ostrich feather factories worked in hot and crowded spaces and breathed in tiny bits of feather fluff. The persistent ambient dust generated by feathers made ailments of the nose, throat and ears ubiquitous.

Stein writes that while the market was booming, observers compared feathers to diamonds in terms of their value as durable luxury goods.

She quotes one such observer, who declared that a fine ostrich feather "is an investment for life" and that the plume "has been in fashion for centuries past, and will probably be for centuries to come." As if to underline his argument, he added, "It holds its place like the diamond."

But, as we know, ostrich feathers did not share the fate of diamonds.

The De Beers diamond syndicate, in an an astonishingly successful advertising campaign, convinced consumers that diamonds were enduring and classy, a girl's best friend, in the words of one classic jingle.

The feather industry made similar attempts to influence buyers, but, as Stein points out, they were insubstantial, underfunded and ill-timed.

By 1915, she says, ostrich feathers were viewed as fragile, dated and even tawdry.

What accounted for their fall from grace?

Ostrich feathers had adorned the hats, fans and clothes of rich European and American women from the second half of the 18th century, but were not widely used until the 1880s.

But as the 20th century dawned, "bird preservationists," as Stein succinctly describes them, launched a campaign to phase out their usage. As a result, anti-plumage bills were passed in the United States and Britain.

Yet before this development, European and American women began demanding more utilitarian clothing as they were pressed into the workforce.

The popularization of the automobile had an effect as well.

As Stein puts it, "Enormous hats were impossible to keep in form or place in open cars. Elaborate feather accessories fared badly in such circumstances."

The resultant feather crash, which started in the winter of 1914, was devastating, bringing financial ruin to farmers, merchants, manufacturers, sorters, wholesalers and handlers from South Africa to the United States.

Stein, in this valuable volume of social and economic history, traces the trajectory of an industry that prospered and died on the whim of fleeting fashion.

Chess – you call that a sport?

By EITAN BEKERMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Chess grandmaster Boris Gelfand is one of Israel's greatest athletes of all time. This was true even before he won the Chess World Cup 2009 competition last month in Siberia, and yet few people know it. Only a few even know that Israel is the deputy world chess champion.

Even before the tournament – almost a month of head-to-head matches against the greatest minds – Gelfand was ranked sixth in the world. Had he been one of the 20 best tennis players, we would have heard a great deal about him. If he were among the world's top 50 soccer players, they'd give him his own television program. But chess? You call that a sport?

Such a question is laughable to countless people in countries from India (home of 2008 world chess champion Viswanathan Anand) to Iceland (which has the largest number of chess players per capita). If sports must entail physical movement, how do you explain prone rifle shooting, which is a recognized Olympic event? Why do sports superpowers such as the former Soviet Union and other east European countries consider chess a major sport, whereas Israel does not?

In general, this is a field where Israel excels (three weeks ago, Marsel Efroimski of Kfar Sava became the girls under-14 world chess champion). It's a game that so many people know on some level, in which fascinating competitions are held year-round throughout the world, with individuals of both sexes, local groups and national teams. Why, then, is it pushed to the sidelines?

The answer might lie, paradoxically, in the fact that chess is considered a "Jews' sport." The list of male and female Jewish champions may be as long as your arm, but our sabra is better off excelling at surfing, mastering a bow and arrow like the Maccabees, shooting a rifle or kicking a ball. What do we have to do with Boris, a bespectacled Russian Jew untouched by the Mediterranean sun? Give us a Gal or Shahar or Yael or Arik.

Don't misunderstand. The latter also deserve respect: windsurfers Gal Fridman and Shahar Zubari and judokas Yael Arad and Arik Ze'evi are wonderful athletes, in sports that likewise require high-level tactical thinking. And if some Alex of the House of Averbuch does come along, then let him be the highest pole vaulter, instead of messing around with queens and kings and pawns. He may also spend his time playing the violin or piano – we certainly respect every culture – but let him not presume to be called an athlete.

Chess is not what writer Max Nordau had in mind when he spoke of "muscular Judaism." Witness the fact that chess has never been included in gym class.

For whatever reason, Israel has a hidden treasure of thousands of top-quality chess players and instructors, many of whom came from the former Soviet Union, who would be capable of conveying their wisdom to tens of thousands of young people and adults, at a negligible cost. But this asset goes unused. The state institutions do not recognize chess as a legitimate sport deserving equal rights, because it is not "Olympic" – not part of the Olympic Games.

"No matter how hard we try, we cannot even figure out whether we need the Education Ministry or the Culture and Sports Ministry to give chess a boost," says international grandmaster Boris Alterman, a leader in the Israeli chess field. Alterman heads the thriving chess academy at Shevah Mofet High School in Tel Aviv, whose students include Efroimski and Gil Popilski, winner of the under-16 boys European Chess Championship. There is another chess program at the elementary/middle school in Savyon-Ganei Yehuda, but they are among the country's only programs.

"We can give hundreds of thousands of schoolchildren skills like developing thinking, perseverance and determination, improving memory," Alterman says, "but the feeling throughout the years has been that we are simply not wanted."

What can you do, Mr. Alterman? That's how it goes in a place that has difficulty seeing more than two moves ahead.

Canadians spearhead effort for Israeli field of dreams

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A two-day delay in last summer's Maccabiah Games softball and baseball tournaments has prompted a couple of Canadian sports enthusiasts to look at building a new sports facility in Israel.

Morrie Frydberg and Lorne Swartz are spearheading an effort to construct a new permanent facility to host the softball and hardball events at upcoming Maccabiah Games.

At the 2009 Games, Maccabiah organizers rented space from the Baptist Village in Petach Tikvah. But that arrangement presented serious problems, Frydberg told The CJN. At the last games, local officials stopped the competition after a couple of days, when it turned out the host village did not have the proper permits for a large-scale event. "We lost two to three days" as teams sat idle, waiting for the problem to be cleared up, Frydberg said. "We don't want that to happen again."

In addition, the fields, though the best in Israel, fall short on a number of grounds. There is no outfield fence – hits can roll forever – and it is costly to rent for a short tournament. A new facility would provide the Maccabiah competition with a venue for future competitions and allow for the development of the sport among Israeli youngsters, Frydberg said.

Frydberg and Swartz are collaborating with Israeli partners in pushing the non-profit project. Three options are being considered. The first is to obtain a long-term lease for a parcel of land near Tel Aviv. The second is for a lease on land in northern Israel, while a third would be to purchase a property near the Baptist Village.

Frydberg, who was born in Israel but moved to Canada as youngster, said the first two options are more economical but even so, a ballpark figure is $1 million (US). That would permit the landscaping of two dedicated fields, construction of a facility that would house changing rooms, a snack bar, offices and storage area plus spectators' stands.

Organizers are working on a budget that is expected to be completed by the end of January. Most of the funds needed for the project are expected to be raised in Canada, the United States and Britain. Naming rights for lights and the field and the building are being considered, he said.

Frydberg, whose return to Israel as an adult felt "like coming home to me," said Canada performed well at the Maccabiah despite the difficulties. The men's open team took the gold and the men's masters team won silver, while the women's open team earned a bronze.

WELCOME TO ISRAEL

A Family Business for over 60 Years

Soup:
1 tblsp unsalted butter
3 shallots, finely chopped
2 12 oz. packages frozen squash purée, thawed
3 c parve soup stock

Pumpkin seeds:
1 tblsp olive oil
3/4 c raw green pumpkin seeds
3/4 tsp ground cumin
Pinch of cayenne pepper

Garnish: 1 tsp finely grated fresh lime zest, 1 tblsp fresh lime juice

Soup: In large saucepan over moderate heat melt butter. Add shallots; saute about 4 min. Stir in squash and stock; bring to boil. Reduce heat and simmer, uncovered, until soup thickens, about 30 min.

Prepare pumpkin seeds: In small skillet over moderate heat, add oil and pumpkin seeds; cook, stirring constantly until seeds begin to pop, 1 - 2 min. Stir in cumin and cayenne pepper and continue to stir & cook about 30 sec. Transfer to bowl and season with generous pinch of kosher or coarse sea salt.

When soup has thickened, remove from heat; stir in lime zest and juice. Season with kosher or fine sea salt and ground black pepper. Ladle into bowls, garnish with pumpkin seeds.

REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

By BILL GLADSTONE

OSTROVTZER YOUTH ORCHESTRA

The Ostrovtzer Synagogue Youth Orchestra was conducted by the eminent violinist Yeshua Yankel Barsh, centre, who lived to be more than 100 years of age. This photo was taken around 1930. The Ostrovtzer shul was located on Cecil Street, just east of Spadina Avenue, in the heart of the former downtown Yiddish district. The congregation moved up north in the late 1960s and its former home still adorned with Hebrew plaques – is now a Chinese community centre.

When I write

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

"The reason one writes isn't the fact that he wants to say something. He writes because he has something to say." –F. Scott Fitzgerald

When I write, there are times the screen seems to just looks back at me, as dumfounded and blank as I am.

Other times, I have an idea, generally one I encountered during the week. Often, I will jot down ideas as they come to me, especially those packed with horseradish. As an example, I'm currently considering writing a piece on what goes into the making of a good speech. I have already sent out a few e-mails to colleagues and friends, asking them what they go through in order to eke out a good talk. I am in awe of fine orators and have a dream of one day being inducted into a speakers' hall of fame.

Oratory. Speech writing. Horseradish. Therein lie the potential for a good commentary.

Every person does indeed have a story. Some stories write themselves and others must be delicately picked from the minds and mouths of the protagonist.

Writing about someone is much harder than writing about something because the notes from an interview can be very detailed. My first draft might be 1,500 words, when the end result must be 600. The editing process can be a literary emasculation.

A favourite article of mine was one I wrote a few years ago about the late Neil Merrick, a good man, someone many of us knew and/or would see walking the streets of Toronto. I titled it "Walking man," after a James Taylor song and felt I was able to bring Neil's footprints to life through my words. I like it to this day.

A happy moment for writers comes when they can read their article after it's been published, and like it, as mistakes seem to abound once it's in ink.

I write a lot about Israel. One article was about Israeli parents and the moment their child walked out the door with a khaki bag and an M16 slung over his shoulder. The thought of a father and mother holding back tears, as they are supposed to do, inspired and saddened me as I wrote. That, and the misunderstanding of the new generation about the importance of Israel, make me write harder.

I write about the Holocaust and anti-Semitism. One of the biggest challenges for me is to write about something other than Jew hatred. I say this because I believe we are not preparing ourselves for another round of anti-Semitism, perhaps a very serious one. I therefore feel compelled to urge, warn and encourage every Jew to work more broadly, intelligently and quickly at creating a movement that would stymie anti-Semitism as never before.

So when I write about Noah and me at the store and laugh, I feel guilty for not being more serious about our troubles. When I compose a piece on a glezel tay (glass of tea), I feel as warm as the drink itself, but figure I'm letting us all off the hook from taking responsibility for our Jewish lives. I'm terribly worried about us. You?

This year, I hope to write about: buildings versus soul in the Toronto Jewish community, the absurd price of kosher olive oil, more of our community members who sing with character and experience – and yes, anti-Semitism. What else is new?

We do not write because we want to; we write because we have to. –Somerset Maugham

Discovery could change Bible dates

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The earliest known Hebrew inscription yet found, dated to the 10th century BCE, should push back the accepted date of several books of the Bible by hundreds of years and confirm the existence of a kingdom led by the legendary King David, a biblical scholar at Israel's Haifa University, says.

Gershon Galil said an inscription uncovered 18 months ago at a dig at Khirbet Qeiyafa, west of Jerusalem, is clearly in ancient Hebrew and resembles the socially conscious prophetic text found in the Bible. The inscription mentions "the king," and the site's impressive fortifications suggest it was part of David's unified Kingdom of Israel.

Gershon Galil

In a telephone interview from Haifa, Galil said the find – Hebrew text on a 15 centimetre by 16.5 centimetre trapezoid pottery shard – "is clearly the most ancient Hebrew inscription ever known and the most important one. It's a prophetic text pointing out social problems."

Galil, who deciphered the inscription, argued that the date of the find coupled with its content suggest that some biblical books, such as Judges, Samuel and parts of the books of Kings and Deuteronomy, might be at least 300 years older than current mainstream scholarship accepts.

Parts of the book of Deuteronomy, for one, are considered the oldest biblical writings, dating from the seventh century BCE in the time of King Josiah. However, the inscription parallels some of the messages found in that book of the Torah. "A few chapters, verses from Deuteronomy might be very, very early, because you have here the same attitude toward the poor," he said.

The News in Brief

Canada

Secter Is Chancellor

WINNIPEG — Harvey Secter was elected the 12th chancellor of the University of Manitoba Dec. 8, becoming the second Jew to hold the post. Secter, who retired in 2008 as U of M's law dean after nine years, reportedly beat former Assembly of First Nations head Phil Fontaine in a closed-door vote by U of M senators and governors.

Firebombing Decried

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada condemned the Jan. 4 firebombing of the Hamilton Mosque. Police said an incendiary device was set off in the principal's office of the mosque's school, but the fire caused by the device burned itself out without causing serious damage. "The firebombing of any house of worship is despicable," said B'nai Brith executive vice-president Frank Dimant, urging police "to investigate this matter as a hate crime."

Linder Founded Spa

TORONTO — Mira Linder, founder of an eponymous day spa called Mira Linder Esthetics – Toronto's first, in 1973 – died in Detroit Dec. 30. She was 88. A Polish-born Holocaust survivor, Linder wrote a book called Beauty Begins at Sixty: The Best Is Yet to Come in 1989.

Ex-CARP Head Dies

TORONTO — Murray Morgenthau, co-founder and former executive director of CARP (originally the Canadian Association of Retired Persons) died Jan. 1 at Toronto's Humber River Regional Hospital at age 89. The Toronto-born Morgenthau co-founded CARP in 1984 with his wife of 60 years, Lillian, who survives him. He headed the 350,000-member group until 2007.

Barring Women Echoes Nazis, Group Says

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada recalled the 1936 Berlin Olympics in slamming the International Olympic Committee for barring female ski jumpers from the Winter Games and urging the IOC to reconsider.

The League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada said the decision to have a men's ski jumping event only recalled the 1936 Games, when the IOC turned a blind eye to Nazi Germany's discriminatory policies against Jews.

Ruth Klein, the rights group's national director, qualified the comparison by saying that she considered the IOC's decision to be a violation of women's rights.

"There is no suggestion that the exclusion of women by the committee is the same as the exclusion of the Jews in 1936, but if you look back at the history – the corporate history – then this is a matter of concern," Klein said.

The IOC claimed women's ski jumping was not developed enough to have it included in the XXI Winter Olympics, which are being held Feb. 12-28 in Vancouver.

Committee members chose to ignore an overwhelming vote by the International Ski Federation calling for female ski jumping to be included in the Games.

Museum Shooter Dies

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The shooter in the attack on the U.S. Holocaust Museum died. James von Brunn, who shot and killed museum guard Stephen Tyrone Johns on June 10 in an attempted armed raid on the museum, died in prison Jan. 6 at age 88. Another guard shot Von Brunn in the face. He recovered and was awaiting trial on possible death penalty charges in a federal prison in Butner, N.C. He had a long history of white supremacist and anti-Semitic writings.

Chabad Threatened

MUMBAI — The Chabad house in Mumbai got a letter threatening another attack. The handwritten letter was received recently at the site where an attack more than a year ago killed six Jews, including Chabad Lubavitch emissaries Rabbi Gavriel and Rivkah Holtzberg, who ran the centre, Ynet reported. It read, in part, "Israel is dogs. We will strike again – heil, Hitler," and was accompanied by a photo of Adolf Hitler. Chabad's Nariman House was one of 10 sites under siege during a three-day attack that started Nov. 26, 2008, by an Islamist Pakistani group that left 166 dead.

No Charges Expected

CHISINAU — No charges will be filed against an anti-Semitic mob that tore down a menorah in Moldova. The prosecutor's office in the capital of Chisinau said it found no evidence a crime was committed, despite video of the Dec. 13 event that's been posted on YouTube.

Russian Jews find a place in new Hillel group

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

When Inna Uretzki was a student at York University, Hillel was never a safe space for her.

It was, in Uretzki's eyes, a place for Canadian Jews.

"[Canadian Jews] are brought up together, they go to the same shul. There's not a lot of acceptance for outsiders," said Uretzki, 24, a Russian Jew. "I felt it. [Canadian Jews] will only let you get close so far."

Uretzki, along with her 20-year-old sister, Suzy, worked with Hillel to change this. The sisters started Jewski, a Toronto campus group aimed at Russian Jews aged about 18 to 26.

The new initiative, which was developed last summer, came out of I'm a Jew.ru, a social group for Russian Jews in the GTA that the sisters helped start about two years ago.

While it was originally aimed at 18- to 26-year-olds, the group began to attract an older demographic.

"There were a few internal issues. We wanted to focus on a different age group," said the older Uretzki.

Her sister agreed.

"There's a lot of difference in terms of interests between the two age groups," she said. "Older[participants] are interested in more cultural events. We don't limit it just to culture. We want to involve students."

This led the sisters to leave Jew.ru and work closely with Hillel to focus on campus life.

"When I started this off, I talked to a lot of people… We [as Russian Jewish students] have different needs," said the younger Uretzki, adding that Jewski has opened her eyes to new experiences.

"You notice so many different people and stories you weren't aware of," she said.

The real story

From the editor's desk...

One of the major news stories in Israel over the weekend reported on the government's reaction to a statement by U.S. special Mideast envoy Senator George Mitchell that the United States might withhold loan guarantees to press the Jewish state to enact policies more to the American liking.

Speaking on PBS on Jan. 6, Mitchell told political commentator Charlie Rose: "Under American law, the United States can withhold support on loan guarantees to Israel."

The reaction in Israel was somewhat delayed but thunderous. The lead of the story in Ha'aretz was: "Israeli officials were up in arms Sunday after Washington's special envoy to the Mideast suggested the U.S. might impose sanctions on Israel and withhold loan guarantees to press it to make concessions in negotiations with the Palestinians, with Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz saying that Israel was 'doing just fine' without American loan guarantees."

The story also quotes reactions to the Mitchell statement from Israel's Education Minister Gideon Sa'ar and Environment Protection Minister Gilad Erdan, as well as from Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's office.

"Everyone realizes that the Palestinian Authority refuses to renew peace talks, while Israel took significant steps to advance the process," the prime minister's statement said.

I hold no brief for Senator Mitchell. Indeed, after I read the Ha'aretz story, I began this column by writing, "The default position of the American government regarding the impasse in Israeli-Palestinian negotiations seems to be to blame Israel."

In fact there may, nevertheless, be considerable truth in the statement. But if there is, it does not arise from the exchange between Mitchell and Rose.

Before committing to the theme that I had originally intended for this column I read the transcript of the entire interview. It is available at the following site: http://thepage.time.com/transcript-george-mitchell-on-charlie-rose

Mitchell made the loan guarantees remark near the end of the interview in which Rose essentially hectored him into giving a hypothetical example of the sort of "stick" that the United States could wield with Israel.

I reproduce the salient reference from the interview.

Mitchell: The reality is that, yes, of course the United States has both carrots and sticks. You have to be very careful about how and when you use them and apply [inaudible]...

Rose: When was the last time we used a stick?

Mitchell: [laughter] Afghanistan, [inaudible]

[talking simultaneously]

Rose: Well, I know, but that's not – I mean nobody's talking about the United States troops going in.

Mitchell: No.

Rose: They're not. Give me – I'm serious about this. You sit there and you say to Israel, if you don't do this, what?

Mitchell: I mean, under American law, the United States can withhold support on loan guarantees to Israel. [My emphasis] President George W. Bush did so.

That was the extent of Mitchell's reference to loan guarantees in his conversation with Rose. It is clear from the context that he is not threatening Israel.

There is, however, a different but also rather important story in the interview. The real story is how Charlie Rose, a prominent commentator on a prominent network (PBS), approached the interview with, what seemed to this observer, an attitude that required "standing up to the Israelis." It was as if he proceeded on the basis of the Palestinian narrative of the conflict.

Indeed, at times, Mitchell was actually vigorously defending Israel, trying to explain things from the Israeli point of view. There were many examples of this, but the exchange regarding Jerusalem was especially instructive. (The exchange has been excerpted due to space limitations.)

Rose: It [the construction freeze] does not include east Jerusalem...

Mitchell: Yes.

Rose: And it's in the midst of Palestinians.

Mitchell: The single most difficult issue amidst an array of extremely difficult issues is Jerusalem – and it is very complicated, difficult, emotional on all sides... But understand the different perspectives, Israel annexed Jerusalem in 1980.

Rose: Annexed is an important word... How many people recognize the annexation, how many countries?

Mitchell: To the best of my knowledge there aren't any. Immediately after the annexation, the United Nations – [talking simultaneously]

Rose: So you're going to let them go ahead even though no one recognized the annexation.

Mitchell: When you say let them go ahead, it's what they regard as their country. They don't regard – they don't say they're letting us go ahead when we build in Manhattan or in the Bronx or – [talking simultaneously]

Rose: But don't the international rules have something to do with what somebody can do to define as their country?

Mitchell: There are disputed legal issues. Of that there can be no doubt."

I repeat: I hold no brief for Senator Mitchell. But in the interview with Rose, he presented Israel's case to a challenger who seemed to have prejudged Israel's case – alas, like so many others in the media.

Jews ask Vatican to reconsider Pope Pius' beatification

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A growing chorus of Jews from around the world is cautioning the Vatican that interfaith relations could suffer if the Church moves to beatify Pope Pius XII before the Holy See's wartimes archives are opened.

Canadian Jewish Congress joined Jewish groups around the world urging the Vatican to take into account "Jewish sensibilities about Pope Pius XII's actions during the Shoah."

"It is not up to us to determine for the Catholic Church who is worthy of sainthood," said Congress president Mark Freiman. "We do, however, feel warranted to observe the process of beatification should not be surrounded by a cloud of controversy."

Beatification is a step that precedes the conferring of sainthood.

In raising concerns, Freiman noted that "in this regard, Congress has long expressed concerns both about what is currently known regarding the war-time conduct of Pius XII in not speaking out regarding the horrors of the Nazi genocide and about the continuing inaccessibility of the Vatican's secret World War II archives that might shed more light on these matters."

Congress repeated its longstanding request that the archives be opened and that "in the absence of the full historical record, we believe it is reasonable to raise objections to any potential acceleration of the beatification of Pope Pius XII."

In mid-December, Pope Benedict XVI issued a decree recognizing the "heroic virtues" of Pius XII, as well as John Paul II, an important milestone on the road to beatification. Critics of Pius XII have argued that he did little to speak out against Nazi atrocities aimed at Jews, although his supporters counter saying he acted behind the scenes to help Jews.

Rabbi David Rosen, former chairman of the International Jewish Committee for Inter-Religious Consultations, criticized Benedict's "insensitivity" toward Jews, while in Italy, the president of the Association of Italian Rabbis, Giuseppe Laras, called it a sad decision, because "this pope did not shout out loud his outrage and his opposition to the Shoah and against the extermination of people whose only crime was that of being Jewish."

The U.S. Anti-Defamation League (ADL) was also highly critical of Benedict's decree. An statement on its website said that it's "a denial of history. And it is an act of aggression against the Jewish people."

"Pope Pius failed to act in a saintly fashion in one very crucial respect: he did not give Jews the help he could and should have during the Holocaust," wrote Rabbi Eric Greenberg, the ADL's director of interfaith policy, and Deborah Dwork, professor of Holocaust history and the director of the Strassler Center for Holocaust and Genocide Studies at Clark University in Worcester, Mass.

Ronald Lauder, president of the World Jewish Congress, questioned the move to beatify Pius. "As long as the archives of Pope Pius about the crucial period 1939-45 remain closed, and until a consensus on his actions – or inaction – concerning the persecution of millions of Jews in the Holocaust is established, a beatification is inopportune and premature," he said.

The Vatican responded to Lauder's comments with a statement saying moves to beatify Pius should not be considered "an obstacle on the path of dialogue between Judaism and the Catholic Church."

And in what is being seen as an important development in Catholic-Jewish relations, Benedict is scheduled to visit Rome's main synagogue next week. That visit was scheduled prior to the December decree.

Congress CEO Bernie Farber said criticism of the potential beatification of Pius "should not be viewed as an attempt by the Jewish community to dictate regarding the beatification of Pius. That's their business, not ours.

"But friends can talk to friends" and caution them about steps "that could cause reactions or pain," Farber added.

Jewish organizations are concerned that until Pius' wartime role is fully revealed, questions will remain whether he did enough to stand up to the Nazis, he said.

Michael Marrus, professor emeritus of Holocaust studies in the University of Toronto's department of history, agreed that it's solely within the purview of the Church to determine who is elevated to sainthood. "But friends owe it to friends to explain what the consequences would be. Frankly, the consequences would not be good for Catholic-Jewish relations. Most people know it."

Marrus, a member of the International Catholic-Jewish Historical Commission, a team of scholars that disbanded after being denied access to Vatican wartime documents nine years ago, said the controversy over Pius is not simply an issue affecting Jews.

"Most critics of Pius XII are Catholic writers," he said, and the Church is divided between progressives and traditionalists regarding his pontificate.

There remains an important constituency within the Church that looks back fondly to the days before John XXIII's reforms of the mid-1960s, he said.

"The truth of the matter is that Pope Pius XII has become a symbol of a certain traditional church – highly centralized with a high degree of authority and reverence for the pope."

"It's not just Jews who would be unhappy if Pius is beatified," he added.

Marrus called for full access to the Vatican's archives during Pius' pontificate, which includes the period up to 1958. In addition to questions about the Church's role during the war, concerns have been raised about its postwar activities, including allegations it helped Nazis escape Europe.

"The Vatican is moving slowly, slowly to open its wartime archives," Marrus acknowledged.

"This is the way the Vatican operates" but "they're moving far too slowly."

Marrus said he remains optimistic that the Vatican will respond to concerns "and they'll decide not to advance this file as it would cause too much damage to the Church."

The nightmare risk of schism

There is an nightmarish threat lurching awkwardly but ever so directly toward the Jewish people. It emanates not from the fiery fundamentalist hatreds of Israel's enemies in Iran, Gaza or Lebanon. It stems not from the competing national aspirations of the Palestinian people. Rather it comes from within, from the contentious factionalism of the Jewish people itself.

The CJN publishes in this issue a powerful cri de coeur from Rabbi Marc D. Angel, the founder and director of the Institute for Jewish Ideas and Ideals in New York, in which he pleads for a change in the manner by which the Orthodox world accepts converts into the Jewish fold.

Rabbi Angel notes that in 2006, the chief rabbinate of Israel opted for greater stringency regarding conversion to Judaism. "At a time when many thousands of people in Israel and the Disapora want to become Jewish, the Orthodox rabbinic gatekeepers are becoming ever more restrictive."

The Israeli rabbinate's more aggressive approach regarding conversion, of course, has reverberated throughout the Jewish world. Our own community in Canada has now joined the debate. A group of mainstream Orthodox rabbis in Montreal has recently publicly objected to what they have referred to as the delegitimization of conversions performed by rabbis of the Rabbinical Council of Canada, the association with which they are affiliated. (Please see the related story in today's paper.)

Ottawa's Rabbi Reuven Bulka, renowned, respected and even revered in some communities and a known battler on behalf of the Jewish people, told the Ottawa Citizen last month that he has decided to stop officiating and directing conversions to Judaism. The difficulties for potential converts are simply too great and too deeply personal for him to abide.

This burgeoning rift that has developed in the past few years has enormous implications for the Jewish People. If left untended, the rift could lead to a deep, irremediable tear and then, God forbid, to a schism within the people. It is with profound humility and with a pressing sense of urgency that we ask the rabbinic authorities within our own community first, and then within the wider Jewish world, to resolve this matter.

We pray and urge that the rabbis of today take their inspiration from Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, the first Ashkenazi chief rabbi of the Jewish community in Mandatory Palestine, who wrote (translated from the Hebrew Shimu Ela'i Ami):

"Harken, O My People/ From the very depths of my soul/I speak unto you… /That you, each one of you/All of you, the whole of you/Your very souls, your generations/ Only you are the essence of my life."

Rabbi Angel bids us to act wisely. The risk in failing to do so is a perilous nightmare that would likely make even God cry.

The judge in Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel's trial for spreading hateful material rejected his lawyer's attempt to have Jews and Freemasons – as well as their employees, relatives and friends – from serving as jurors in the case. The judge said there was no evidence that race or religion would prevent them from being fair and impartial.

Discrimination against Israeli Arabs

Considering the editorial stance often taken by The CJN, my jaw almost dropped into the latke batter when I read the editorial take on the importance of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights ("An anniversary sadly noted," Editor's desk, Dec. 10). It is a key international law milestone, one to which there was a large Canadian contribution.

For years now, The CJN has paid little attention to the Jewish belief that yes, "all human beings are deserving of equal dignity and respect." This lack concerns the 20 per cent of the Israeli population that is not Jewish. The non-Jewish Israelis receive less funding for municipal, educational and health services, and there is job and housing discrimination. Rights that Jews bravely fought for in western democracies are abused, by any democratic standard, in Israel today. The CJN, editorially, rarely condemns the complete disconnect between occupation and rights.

Jews have been active in the human rights movement because, as a discriminated against minority, they suffered from and developed empathy for those suffering injustice. It is time to apply that sensitivity to questioning Israeli policies. How many West Bank settlements will the Israeli government foster in land that no international law sanctions as Israel's and that Israel claims to be negotiable? How many checkpoints, far beyond security needs, designed to humiliate an indigenous population, will be tolerated? How many Arabs are denied permits when it comes to their desire to build to accommodate "natural growth" in their communities?

We Jews, when considering Israel's policies, have allowed a dangerous amalgam of triumphalism and fear to dilute the important human rights tenets of our religion. The cry that I cherish, Am Yisrael Chai, should not be uttered with ethnocentrism but with an inclusive humanity as represented by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Grateful to be a realist

I object to the characterization your reporter made of two speakers at a debate in Toronto ("U of T profs debate Palestinian statehood," Nov. 26). In the article, the speaker who touted a two-state solution to the Israel-Palestinian conflict is labelled an "optimist," while his opponent, who questioned Arabs' readiness for peace, is labelled a "pessimist."

My opinions most closely resemble those of the latter, yet I do not consider myself to be a pessimist at all. Rather, I am extremely grateful to be a realist who recognizes the Arabs' continuing hatred of and incitement against Israel and is not duped by the illusion that still more Israeli concessions somehow will win Arabs' good favour or that creation of a Palestinian state will suddenly bring peace. I am optimistic that an improving Palestinian economy in the West Bank, where most Palestinians reside, eventually will lead to demands by Palestinians for better leadership prepared to make concessions necessary for a lasting peace.

Those who cling to failed peace paradigms such as "land for peace," which have brought Israel only more violence and done little to encourage more pragmatic Palestinian leaders, are themselves the "pessimists" who would condemn the peace process to continued failure. I suggest your reporters report what is news rather than what they may think of the newsmakers.

God or G-d

As a religious Jew, I find it gratifying to find G-d mentioned quite frequently in your pages. Yet I am puzzled as to why you use the full spelling of this word, instead of the traditional "G-d." Surely Jews across the religious spectrum are familiar with this spelling. Furthermore, using "G-d" avoids the issue of shemos or names of G-d, which, according to halachic authorities, would enjoin readers against recycling used newspapers, or bringing the paper into the washroom. For reasons of respect as well as ease of disposal, I urge you to switch to "G-d."

Editor's note: G-d is by no means a name for God. It is simply a generic appellation like Lord, or Divine, or Providence. We try assiduously to avoid at all times the publication of any of the names that appear in the Bible for God.

Return conversion to local rabbis

By RABBI MARC D. ANGEL

For centuries, rabbis steeped in Torah and Halachah have served as the gatekeepers of the Jewish people. They have determined which non-Jews may join the Jewish people as converts.

Halachic literature provides a wide array of opinions and attitudes relating to conversion. In recent years, however, the more extreme views espoused by the haredi rabbinic establishment have gained predominance – and those Orthodox rabbis who don't share these views have been increasingly marginalized.

Rabbi Marc Angel

In 2006, Israel's chief rabbinate announced that it would no longer accept conversions performed by Orthodox rabbis in the Diaspora, unless these rabbis were on a pre-approved list (i.e., they were deemed sufficiently haredi in their approach). The mainstream Orthodox rabbinic group in the United States, the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA), essentially went along with the dictates of the chief rabbinate. The RCA set up regional rabbinic courts to oversee conversions. The individual Orthodox rabbi — even if a member in good standing of the RCA – generally won't have his conversions accepted by the rabbinate in Israel, unless the convert has gone through the RCA's conversion bureaucracy.

The result of this shift in authority has been profound. Good, talented and well-intentioned Orthodox rabbis in the Diaspora have been eliminated as recognized gatekeepers to the Jewish people. Power has been concentrated in fewer hands. The more restrictive views on conversion have become universalized, leaving rabbis with little leeway in dealing with candidates for conversion who are not ready to become fully Orthodox Jews. Rabbi Ben-Zion Uziel, who was the first chief Sephardi rabbi of the State of Israel, sought halachically valid ways to bring such individuals into Judaism and the Jewish people. The current rabbinic hierarchy shuts the door on them.

At a time when many thousands of people in Israel and the Diaspora want to become Jewish, the Orthodox rabbinic gatekeepers are becoming ever more restrictive. They adopt new stringencies not required by the Talmud, the Rambam or the Shulchan Aruch. There are women whose conversions have been denied because they wear pants — loose-fitting, modest pants. I know a woman whose conversion was rejected because the rabbinic court did not think her boyfriend was sufficiently Orthodox. A number of would-be converts have been told that they will not be accepted for conversion unless they first move to more religious neighbourhoods — even though they currently attend an Orthodox synagogue in the neighbourhood where they presently reside. Meanwhile, rabbinic courts in Israel have annulled conversions when converts lapse from a stringent observance of mitzvot.

These restrictive policies are not mandated by Halachah. They reflect a deep xenophobia and a narrow view of Jewish peoplehood. These policies prevent and deter many people from converting to Judaism according to Halachah. They cause unspeakable pain and frustration to numerous individuals who want to cast their destiny with the Jewish people – but who are rejected, humiliated or threatened by the rabbinic bureaucracy.

In recent months, we have witnessed scandal after scandal involving haredi rabbis. In a particularly notorious case, Rabbi Leib Tropper – who set himself up as the head of an influential haredi conversion authority, the Eternal Jewish Family – has resigned his position due to allegations of particularly heinous and repulsive behaviour, reportedly involving sexual coercion of a prospective convert.

These high-profile scandals should be cause for alarm. But we should also be concerned about the scandal of what is being foisted upon the public as "true Judaism." At an Eternal Jewish Family conference, Rabbi Nachum Eisenstein stated that Rabbi Yosef Sholom Elyashiv, one of the haredi world's leading authorities, holds that any rabbi who believes the world is more than approximately 6,000 years old should not serve on the rabbinic courts that perform conversions. (Rabbi Elyashiv is not known to have disputed this characterization of his views.) Indeed, the Eternal Jewish Family includes a question on "the Torah view of the age of the universe" in its testing of would-be converts. Knowing that we have perfectly legitimate traditions in Torah Judaism that allow for belief in a universe billions of years old, should we allow the obscurantists to disqualify all rabbis who dare to accept the clear findings of science? Do we want such people as the gatekeepers of Jewish identity?

The Orthodox rabbinate has become narrower and more extreme, exactly at a time when world Jewry is very much in need of responsible, creative, sensitive and inclusive religious leadership. Can the State of Israel afford to have a bureaucracy of rabbinic gatekeepers who seem more interested in keeping people out than in letting them in? Can world Jewry afford to leave halachic conversion in the hands of a rabbinic hierarchy that refuses to draw on the inclusive opinions within Halachah, that insists on creating higher and higher barriers, that values restrictiveness as a sign of religiosity? Can we really trust a haredi-dominated rabbinic establishment that does not inspire our respect as a model of morality, idealism and intellectual vitality?

The Jewish People needs and deserves an effective and inclusive halachic framework for accepting converts. The current gatekeepers have not served us well, and there is no sign that they will change their ways if left to their own devices. We would do much better by dismantling the current rabbinic bureaucracy and leaving conversion in the hands of local Orthodox rabbis – as had been the practice for centuries. Let each rabbi draw on the halachic sources that best apply to each situation and not have his hands tied by an inflexible and restrictive hierarchy. Let each halachic convert be fully accepted as a Jew in the State of Israel and throughout the Diaspora.

If some in the haredi world will not accept the Jewishness of such converts, then that is a problem for the haredim. The Jewish people as a whole should not be held hostage to the extreme views of the rejectionists.

Halachic conversions performed by local Orthodox rabbis will draw many more converts into the Jewish people more efficiently, more compassionately and with more halachic integrity. Every bona fide member of a reputable national or international Orthodox rabbinic body should be empowered to perform conversions. Each rabbinic organization must ensure that its members conduct conversions according to Halachah, with the highest ethical standards, and without financial remuneration.

The Torah describes the People of Israel as a wise people. Let us, then, act wisely.

Conflicts with the haredi community in Israel have flared this year. Left, demonstrators protest haredi violence in response to the opening of a parking lot in Jerusalem on the Sabbath. The sign, pointing to a haredi enclave, reads "Tehran is there." Above, an Israeli argues with a group of observant youngsters who called him a Nazi.

I'm a rabbi, and I'm an optimist.

Optimism is awkward for the Jewish community. Every year, we get chronologically – and perhaps spiritually – further away from the events of the Bible. Contemporary assimilation is predicted by the theological concept of yeridat hadorot, the decline of generations, which affirms that each generation is spiritually inferior to the previous one. Yeridat hadorot can leave Jews with the melancholy feeling that we have missed the boat historically.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

The unprecedented tranquility that Jews now have has sped up our spiritual decline. We were always prepared for the challenges of persecution, but we've been woefully unprepared for the challenges of prosperity. Affluence has brought with it a soul-numbing materialism that leaves people uninterested in religious values and spiritual depth. At the same time, Jews are so well accepted into North American society that the engagement of former U.S. president Bill Clinton's daughter to a Jew went unremarked in the national press.

Considering the powerful forces for assimilation, it's easy to imagine the gradual disappearance of the Jewish people. Jewish optimism seems impossible. There are just too many things for a Jew to worry about.

But Jewish pessimism is costly. Worrying too much leads to anger and distrust. Paranoia magnifies concerns about anti-Semitism to the point that a president who is less supportive of Israel than his predecessor is seen as an anti-Zionist, and his Jewish aides are branded self-hating Jews.

In this culture of pessimism, disagreements become exaggerated, and ideological rivals are no longer opponents, but rather enemies. (Yitzhak Rabin's assassination is the prime example of this, but that same hatred can still be found today in too many groups on both the left and the right.) Rabbi Naftali Tzvi Berlin astutely predicted that constructive criticism can morph into unhealthy condemnation and create a paranoid atmosphere where anyone to one's right or left is hated for their fanaticism or heterodoxy.

Jewish pessimism makes sense, but that's precisely the point: Jewish survival is based on absurd optimism. So each year, in the frigid darkness of the Montreal winter, I light a candle of optimism. This candle, the light of the menorah, contains the lesson of Jewish survival: that miracles are possible, if you're optimistic about the possibilities that one jar of oil has.

The menorah's lesson is that Jewish survival requires optimism, and that it's time for Jews to stop looking for the worst in their fellow Jews. It's time to celebrate the possibilities of the Jewish future, because when it comes to Jewish destiny, the jar is never seven-eighths empty, it's always one-eighth full.

Tory attacks on Cotler must stop

Although enemies of Islamism, anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism must make common cause against the terrorists, the appeasers and their apologists in the world today, some Canadian conservatives are making partisan hay out of these defining issues of our time. In so doing, they have foolishly targeted MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler as a way of condemning the Liberal party for its weak response to the challenge of terror when Jean Chrétien was prime minister.

Gil Troy in Montreal

It doesn't make sense. Conservatives shouldn't be making support for Israel, rejection of anti-Semitism, the fight against Islamism and the push for human rights partisan issues. Democracies work when not everything is reduced to partisan warfare, when patriots can distinguish between areas of disagreement and those arenas where they share common values, methods and goals.

As someone who denounced Chrétien's snivelling policies regarding Islamist terrorists as well as his moral paralysis in the face of anti-Israel terror, and as someone who continues to combat anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism today, as well as someone who has frequently thanked the Stephen Harper government for its courageous stands on these issues, I am appalled that Conservatives are fighting Cotler rather than Canada's real enemies.

We must confront the appeasers and apologists, the new anti-Semites and the terrorist Islamists who threaten us today. But Cotler has led the fight worldwide against anti-Semitism, anti-Zionism and illiberalism, serving as an invaluable ally during the darkest days of former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's war of terror, and pushing Liberals to evolve better policy stances – which most of them did.

We should be celebrating Canada's non-partisan support for Israel and anti-Semitism as one of this government's achievements, rather than making it a divisive, partisan issue. The Jewish community must stand strong, both defending Cotler and sending the message that we can't be played for fools.

In the ultimate absurdity, the indictment against Cotler hinges on accusing him of failing to stand up when he actually took political risks to stand strong. Accusing Cotler of complicity in the 2001 Durban hatefest is like claiming the Canadian Mounties were never interested in getting their man. When historians look back on the Durban debacle and its aftermath, they will put Cotler front and centre in the story. Since that awful conference, Cotler has done more to highlight its abuses than almost any other living person. He has been the conscience of the Liberal party, as well as of Canada and of the human rights community.

For the record, I am a colleague, friend and fan of Prof. Irwin Cotler of McGill University, a Canadian hero, a Jewish hero and one of the great men striding across the world stage today. These attacks have inspired me to do what I have long thought of doing – in this new year, I am asserting one of my few powers as an academic and nominating Cotler for a prize he has long deserved, the Nobel Peace Prize.

For decades – as a lawyer, law professor and legislator – Cotler has stood up for the world's downtrodden. He has represented dissidents fighting for their lives in dictatorships and has prodded democracies to remember that human rights begin at home but are universal. He has freed prisoners of conscience and been the world's conscience, most recently confronting the Iranian government's calls for genocide, its nuclear ambitions, its support for state-sponsored terrorism and its unholy war against its own people.

He's dedicated his life to protecting the rights embedded in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, fulfilling the universal ideals that united democracies in the fights against Nazism, and guaranteeing that "Never again" is a watchword for us all. He has protected the Canadian patrimony while embodying Canada's noble commitment to being a force for good in the world.

I am thrilled that Harper's Conservative government has returned Canada to its role as the world's conscience. But I also acknowledge Cotler's role in making many of these issues non-partisan and all-Canadian. In this new decade, let's co-operate to defeat our enemies, remembering that, even in election years, the core values uniting us should override the policy differences that may occasionally divide us.

My Chanukah that wasn't

I admit that when my kids were growing up, I was the "one present every night and a really big one on the last night" kind of Chanukah mom. That was the family tradition in which I was raised, along with numerous tinselly window decorations and a huge "Happy Hanukkah" banner across the front door. It made me proud to be so visibly Jewish at the most otherwise-invisible time of year.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein in Jerusalem

I felt like "one of the crowd" with my peers and friends, even the Jewish ones. It was joyous, festive and somewhat Christmasy, to be honest. My mom tried very hard to compete with the secular culture around us, and most years she won. I have very fond memories of those years, and Chanukah with my own kids was always something of a treat, even if we didn't go "all the way." And while I'm generally a Christmas Scrooge – I go grocery shopping with headphones on, listening to Israeli music so I don't get jingle-belled into oblivion – I never really minded if the "holiday spirit" started creeping into Chanukah.

So imagine my surprise when Chanukah came and went in Jerusalem without any hoopla at all. It was so understated that one could practically have missed it.

"That was Chanukah?" my kids asked at the end of the eighth day. I mean, Yom Kippur was so quiet you could hear a pin drop, even in secular neighbourhoods. Sukkot was a major deal, with kiosks full of decorations, instant pop-up sukkah marts on every corner and public sukkot at every restaurant. Even rosh chodesh gets its own "Have a good month" banners in restaurants and special services in shul.

I did notice electric menorahs on every lamppost on King David Street, buses that flashed "Chanukah Samayach" on their front panels, and glass-covered chanukiyot outside people's homes. (First prize goes to the house that made its outdoor chanukiyah out of eight beer bottles and a Scotch-bottle shamash hanging on a tree.) We went to lots of latke dinners. We heard Handel's Judas Maccabeus in the Jerusalem Theatre. (The same concert also featured Handel's Messiah. Go figure.)

But there were very few chanukiyot in store windows – except those for sale – and very little Chanukah music on Israeli radio, and nobody buys anybody presents, except for really little tchatchkes for really little kids. When I went to a store and ordered something for my 20-year-old son, she asked me when I needed to pick it up. I said, "In time for Chanukah, of course," and she looked at me as if she didn't get it at all and I was nuts.

It was, to be honest, weird to have Chanukah be "just" Chanukah, exactly the way we Diaspora rabbis talk about it every year in the "Chanukah isn't Christmas" battle. In Jerusalem, it's really "just" Chanukah, as we keep insisting it should be. It's liberating, but at the same time a little lame.

I have to confess: I missed the hoopla.

Does it have to be all or nothing? It's like Israel has gone the other way: since we don't have Christmas (except in the Old City), let's not have Chanukah either? Because "they" – the Anglo North Americans, the Russians, the foreign Thai workers – have Christmas-Chanukah confusion, and they still celebrate "New Year's Eve," which we know isn't the real thing (and which is shunned by kosher hotels for fear of losing their hechshers), let's not confuse them by making Chanukah a big deal? Even Tu b'Shvat gets more press here.

So the kids get their "winter break" at Chanukah and everyone goes to Eilat, where you can light a chanukiyah in the hotel lobby.

Maybe what we needed was some snow to get in the mood. I don't know, but now that the darkness of December has passed, I'm waiting for Tu b'Shvat for some fun.

The Kirshner File

Palestinian doctor transcends tragedy

Izzeldin Abuelaish, a Muslim Palestinian physician whose life and family history have been punctuated by tragedy, could easily have been a prisoner of the past, consumed by bitterness, hatred and vengeance.

Consider the facts.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

His parents were evicted from their farm in Israel by the Israeli army during the first Arab-Israeli war in 1948. Last winter, amid Israel's war with Hamas, three of his six daughters, as well as his niece, were killed when Israeli shells inexplicably struck his home in the Gaza Strip.

Nevertheless, Abuelaish, a 54-year-old gynecologist and obstetrician, does not accentuate the negative. "We have to look forward and build a common future," said Abuelaish, who has worked in Toronto since last summer. "That's the message. Israel is there, the Palestinians are there. Let's find a way for Israel and the Palestinians to live in peace and mutual respect, without violence."

It is supremely ironic that he was a victim of what he brands as "a crazy war."

A longtime advocate of Arab-Israeli coexistence and amity, he completed his residency in obstetrics and gynecology at Soroka Hospital in Be'er Sheva after studying at the University of London and Cairo University.

A doctor who practised medicine in Gaza and served as policy adviser to the World Health Organization in Afghanistan, he was thrust headlong into the maelstrom of the three-week Gaza war at exactly 4:45 p.m. on Jan. 16, 2009.

On that fateful afternoon, his home near the Jebalya Palestinian refugee camp was hit by two Israeli tank shells.

"I remember the dust, the darkness and the flashes of light," he said.

Most of all, he remembers the carnage. The first projectile killed his daughters Bisan, 20, Mayar, 15, and Aya, 13, and their 14-year-old cousin, Nour, leaving scattered body parts, and badly injured another daughter, Shatha, 16, and her cousin, Ghaida, 13.

The second bombardment injured two of his brothers and another niece.

In desperation, Abuelaish – a fluent Hebrew speaker who had recently lost his wife to the ravages of cancer – contacted an Israeli television journalist, Shlomi Eldar. Abuelaish's anguished pleas for assistance were broadcast live on Channel 10, in one of the most publicized tragedies of a war that claimed the lives of 1,400 Palestinians and 13 Israelis.

Eldar arranged for the wounded to be transported to the Sheba Medical Center, part of Tel Hashomer Hospital in Tel Aviv, an institution that had employed Abuelaish as a health policy researcher since January 2008.

Remarkably enough, the tragedy has not dimmed his ardour for reconciliation, though he has retained a lawyer and insists that the Gaza war increased Arab animosity toward Israel and proved that military solutions are futile.

"The Palestinians and Israelis are like conjoined twins," said Abuelaish, the Michael and Amira Dan professor of global health at the University of Toronto's Dalla Lana School of Public Health. "We have a common destiny and future."

In honour of his late daughters, he has created a foundation, a living legacy, to promote education and leadership programs for girls and women in the Middle East.

"I had two choices," he explained. "The path of light or the path of darkness."

Tammie Ronen Rosenbaum, one of Abuelaish's Israeli friends, was not surprised that he channelled his anger and grief into a constructive project.

"He is very positive," said Rosenbaum, the director of the Renata Adler Memorial Research Center for Child Welfare and Protection at Tel Aviv University's Bob Shapell School of Social Work.

"He has an ability to look at the bright side of things," she added. "As we say, if you get lemons, you make lemonade. He really believes in peace and tries to understand both sides of the conflict. If you examine his personal history, you see a story of coping and self-control."

Abuelaish was born and raised in Jebalya, a densely populated Palestinian refugee camp in northern Gaza where the first Palestinian uprising erupted in December 1987. Since then, it has been a Hamas stronghold.

The Abuelaish family hails from the Palestinian village of Huj, which was situated in the northern edge of the Negev Desert and sat astride a road that connected Gaza to Be'er Sheva.

Founded in the early 19th century, when the Ottoman Turks ruled Palestine, Huj was visited by the American biblical scholar Edward Robinson in 1838 when its 200 to 300 inhabitants dwelled in mud buildings. During World War I, Ottoman and British forces fought near Huj. By the mid-1940s, Huj had a population of approximately 800.

The farmers of Huj cultivated a variety of crops, mainly grain, fruit and almonds.

Izzeldin Abuelaish

"My father, Mohammed, had a farm," said Abuelaish. "He was a simple worker. My grandfather was the muhktar, the mayor, of Huj."

On May 31, 1948, two weeks after Arab armies invaded Palestine in a bid to wipe out the newly proclaimed State of Israel, the Israeli army's Negev Brigade entered Huj, which was close to the Egyptian front, and ordered its residents to leave.

According to Israeli historian Benny Morris, the villagers were driven into Gaza and their houses were looted and blown up. Huj was one of more than 400 Palestinian villages in what is now Israel that disappeared during the fighting.

Although some Israeli officials believed that Huj was a "friendly" Arab village, others claimed that it was "unreliable." Eventually, exiled villagers petitioned Israel to be allowed to return, but their appeal was in vain.

Huj's land was appropriated by Kibbutz Dorot, which was formed in 1941. Today, Dorot – a lush oasis amid barren hills – manufactures irrigation valves and is apparently Israel's largest single producer of carrots, which are exported to the United States, Europe, Russia and Persian Gulf emirates.

To Abuelaish, as to the vast majority of Palestinians, the 1948 war, including the destruction of Huj, was nothing less than a nakba, or catastrophe.

Yet unlike many Palestinians, Abuelaish is extremely reluctant to dwell on this disaster, which caused the flight of approximately 700,000 Palestinians from Palestine.

He prefers to talk about the present, with all its problems and challenges.

"We go from crisis to crisis," he said in a reference to Israelis and Palestinians. "From nakba to nakba. We have to move forward and build the future. Palestinians are eager to fulfil their potential. Give us a chance."

An arch realist, he is confident that Israel and the Palestinian Authority will resume negotiations, and that a two-state solution is still possible. He claims that his views are representative of most Palestinians."If there is a will, there is a way. Everything is possible. Did you think that a black guy, Barack Obama, would be president of the United States?"

He calls on Israel to agree to a total settlement freeze in the West Bank if it is serious about peace. "The ball is in Israel's court. Netanyahu can make a difference."

Abuelaish, who carries a Palestinian Authority passport but describes himself as a citizen of the world, intends to remain in Canada for at least the next five years, the duration of his contract with the University of Toronto. His contract entitles him to an office, a house, a car and a research assistant.

Members of ECRUSY and USYers from northern New York spend time together in Union Station in Chicago.

USYers meet in Chicago

Compiled by CJN Staff

Fifteen Canadians were among the delegates last month as Chicago played host to United Synagogue Youth's 59th annual international convention.

The teens were there representing ECRUSY, the eastern Canadian region of USY – the high school affiliate of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism – which covers Ontario, Quebec and the Atlantic Provinces. As well, this year's event was co-chaired by David Wallach of Thornhill, the immediate past-president of ECRUSY, along with Chelsea Wagner of Rochester, N.Y.

The convention, held Dec. 27 to 31 at the Chicago Marriott Downtown Hotel, located on the Magnificent Mile, is the largest yearly gathering of its kind and gives Jewish teens from across North America the opportunity to enjoy exciting activities with a blend of education, social action and fun.

The ECRUSY delegates began their trip on Dec. 23 with delegates from the TZAFON region (northern New York) on an overnight train trip before joining delegates from metropolitan New York at Moriah Congregation in Deerfield, Ill., for a few days of fun, sightseeing and a restful Shabbat prior to the convention.

"The pre-convention time allows our USYers to really get to know other Jewish teens before the impact of opening ceremonies, which is akin to the Olympics," said ECRUSY director Rabbi Jennifer Gorman.

Convention participants explored the theme "Love Your Neighbour, Love Yourself." In workshops, informal classes and group activities, delegates explored the value and importance of friendship, the power of words, and how their behaviour affects people they interact with every day.

Convention delegates also heard from Ronald Wolfson, author, Fingerhut Professor of Education at the Americam Jewish University in Los Angeles and president of Synagogue 300. Wolfson, who also led a special staff session, urged delegates to help create more welcoming communities within our synagogues. After his speech, Wolfson, who grew up attending a USCJ shul in Omaha, Neb., was given the USY Alumni Award by international youth chair Paul Kochberg of Toronto.

Another highlight was a ceremony recognizing the hundreds of couples who met through USY summer programs, including Rabbi David Seed and Lori Seed of Adath Israel Congregation.

As part of a longstanding tradition, delegates spent one day of the convention taking part in a social action project to benefit the convention's host city. This year, USY hosted a carnival and holiday party for children from the Chicago area.

Delegates brought gifts, ran booths, and acted as chaperones, giving the visiting children much-needed attention. Participants in USY's summer Mission Mitzvah program used clowning skills they learned as hospital clowns to entertain.

At day's end one mother, while offering thanks, reported that her child had never received a gift before.

Convention director Karen Stein emphasized the importance of community projects to USY's educational goals. "Part of our objective is to teach the Jewish values of gemilut chasadim, performing acts of loving-kindness for others, and tikkun olam, literally, repairing the world. It's also nice to make a positive impact on the surrounding community while teaching our youth the importance of helping others, regardless of their faith or race."

David Helfand of Leawood, Kan., the 2009 international USY president said the convention helps teens network.

"USYers come to the international convention because it's a tremendous opportunity to see old friends and make new ones from all over North America," he said. "It's a great place to exchange ideas about successful USY programs. There's a good chance that what works in Toronto can help someone's program in Dallas."

Added Stein: "The impact can last for months, even after convention is over. When USYers go back to their regions and chapters, they give a real boost to the level of programming and involvement in USY."

ECRUSY received an award for highest percentage membership increase during the past year. As well, ECRUSY came in second in the Tikkun Olam Coin Challenge, raising $900 (US) for tzedakah at the convention, and it received an honourable mention in the International Israel Challenge, a program that educates youth about Israel through programs and information in the regions. Beit Rayim Synagogue in Thornhill was also honoured as a nominee for chapter of the year.

New generation revives Yavne Zion

'Marlee Shul' expands outreach

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Congregation Yavne Zion, established about 125 years ago in downtown Toronto, has undergone a renaissance of sorts in recent years.

Housed since 1963 in rented space at the Toronto Zionist Centre on Marlee Avenue, the congregation hired Rabbi Yehuda Oppenheimer, a Grade 10 Jewish studies teacher at Yeshiva Darchei Torah, to be its spiritual leader in 2004. The shul hadn't had a rabbi in about two decades, since the death of his predecessor.

Rabbi Oppenheimer's first few years with the congregation were "pretty lonely," given its aging and diminishing membership and the small number of attendees. "In January and February, we shut down, because people went to Florida."

In contrast, in the 1980s, there were as many as 100 people at Shabbat morning services, said the rabbi in a recent interview.

Things started to pick up again when some of his students began to attend services, said the 36-year-old native of New York's Lower East Side. About 40 new families joined the shul last year.

A resident of Toronto for the past eight years, Rabbi Oppenheimer studied for the rabbinate in Israel before moving here.

Now there are about 50 men at a typical Saturday morning service, he said. A smaller number of women sit behind a mechitzah at the back of the room. Only a handful of older members are still able to attend.

Zalman Goldman, a new member who is in his late 30s and who also belongs to two other shuls, wants to support Yavne Zion, but in addition, he said, "we're liking the energy."

Longtime president Abram Kaufman, a native of Poland who immigrated to Canada in 1953, told The CJN that it was "very hard to get a minyan" before Rabbi Oppenheimer joined the shul. Now, he said, the service is "ungelebt" (lively), because of the number of young people. "It's a relief. We're very happy with them."

Recent programming at the shul reflects its changing demographic. About three dozen children and their parents attended a Sunday morning Chanukah program featuring D Jay the Clown. Also, a Saturday evening Chanukah event for adults featured a hypnotist, as well as Rabbi Mordechai Torczyner of Zichron Dov Yeshiva University Torah Mitzion Beit Midrash speaking about the holiday.

Rabbi Yehuda Oppenheimer

Although some of the younger shul-goers refer to the congregation as the "Marlee Shul," its name remains Yavne Zion, Rabbi Oppenheimer said. "We're not two congregations… We want to keep the official name."

Younger members don't receive cemetery privileges, however, because there are no more plots available for them, and dues are allocated accordingly.

Also, said the rabbi, the younger attendees are all Orthodox, while most of the older members are not, although they wanted the synagogue to continue being Orthodox.

There are about 65 original members, but most of them don't attend services, said the rabbi.

Although the shul has expanded its reach both by attracting new members and expanding its programming, Rabbi Oppenheimer notes that it's still "only a weekend shul." Hence its relatively low membership dues, at $325 a year per family.

Yavne Zion offers Shabbat services on Friday night and Saturday, as well as on Sunday mornings and Jewish holidays, as well as Jewish learning sessions.

Jewski fills important need on campus

The main difference that separates Jewski from other Hillel initiatives is the way in which Judaism is viewed by most Russian Jews, the sisters said.

"We were brought up with Judaism being a culture rather than a religion," Suzy said.

Her sister agreed.

"A lot of [Russian] people don't practise [Judaism], a lot of people don't know the rules," Uretzki said. "I'm not religious at all, but seeing the lighting of the Shabbat candles, [it's] a beautiful tradition."

For the sisters, the tradition is spiritual, but not necessarily religious.

This is reflected in many of Jewski's events. While the group has Shabbat dinners and recently organized a Chanukah party, they were careful not to impose.

"We recognize that there are a bunch of people who are [religious]. We do as much as we can," Uretzki said. "We're primarily a social group. People are not necessarily going to go for something religious."

The sisters first began working with the Russian Jewish community after attending a Shabbaton in Chicago about two years ago, where they were exposed to the city's Russian Jewish population.

For Suzy, it was a "bull's-eye" moment.

"I finally understood what being a Russian Jew was," she said. "I wanted to give some people the opportunity to have that aha moment."

Alona Geysman, Hillel's Russian Jewish programming administrator at York, is working with both Uretzkis to meet this goal.

As a Russian Jew, Geysman understands the importance of Jewski.

"When I was on campus, I wasn't necessarily attracted by something that was too Jewish. I thought the Thornhill crowd would be there – people with Canadian Jewish backgrounds," she said. "I feel like the Russian Jewish students should be able to go to Hillel and Jewski is a way to pull them in."

For Alex Goldstein, 23, a recent York University graduate who immigrated to Canada from Ukraine in 2000, the group is filling an important need.

"It's really something good for Russian Jews to have," he said, adding that he attended both Jew.ru and Jewski events.

"It hits the spot. We are unique in our experiences. We need something that represents us specifically. We're not a small group to ignore or disregard. We can't be merged with other Jews."

The last Jew in Beirut

By SAM MEDNICK

Chain-smoking, she strokes her cats, coddling them with one hand while dumping copious amounts of sugar into her Nescafé with the other. Liza's eyes comb the alleyway outside her apartment in downtown Beirut, and keeping her voice to a whisper, she motions for me to dispose of the video camera.

"Cache la camera!" Quickly throwing it inside my translator's backpack, I continue looking inconspicuous. The 50-something, feisty, red-haired Beirut veteran, was, to say the least, slightly paranoid. But as I sat sipping my café on the newly reconstructed cobblestone street with the "last Jew in Beirut," I wondered how much of her wariness was justified and how much was habitual.

Strong, independent and very matter of fact, Liza Srour wouldn't tell me exactly how old she was; only that she'd lived through the 1967 war, Lebanon's civil war and had seen Beirut's Jewish quarter evolve from a thriving 100,000-person community to less than 50 registered "closeted" Jews today.

But when I first met Liza, we couldn't discuss the past. Sitting outside her apartment, just a stone's throw from the prime minister's lair, she's surrounded by guards. Although somewhat famous and highly regarded among the guards as the last Jew in the city, Liza remained focused on her cats and her coffee until we changed locations.

"It's just not something we talk about in Beirut. We don't speak about religion. Nobody talks about these things in Lebanon, only in private," she later explains after we'd switched scenes. Yet even in her friend's apartment on the other side of town, Liza was hesitant to speak freely.

Born and raised in Beirut and having lived all her life in the city, Liza watched her parents pass on, her brothers move overseas and her Jewish neighbours emigrate to Paris and Montreal. Today, she lives alone in Hayy el Yahoud, now called, Wadi Abu Jmil. What used to be Beirut's Jewish district is now being converted into the city's financial sector. When asked how she feels being known as Beirut's last Jew, Liza shrugs it off.

"That's what people say, but I'm not the last Jew. There are maybe another 100 Jews living in other quarters in Beirut. I just don't know them and don't see them."

And that's because for the most part, it's still not cool to be Jewish in Lebanon.

"I don't think any Jew in this country has worn a yarmulke since the civil war," says Ronnie Chatah, a Lebanese native and founder of Walk Beirut, the city's only tour company. "I think it became unpopular," says Chatah, explaining that the history of the Jews in Lebanon is a "missing chunk" that usually remains unknown unless specifically explored.

And so in 2006, as part of his company's five-hour city walking tour, Chatah decided to include a visit to the old Jewish quarter and the 1923 synagogue currently under reconstruction. It's people's favourite part of the tour, he says.

"Imagine, you're in Arab Middle East, walking around Lebanon and suddenly you discover that there's a synagogue next to the prime minister's office. It's a big synagogue, and you won't know it unless you walk up right in front of it. I think this makes people think a little more about the country's history and maybe even challenges them to think about what Beirut was just 50 or 60 years ago."

And when it comes to Jews in Lebanon half a century ago, things were very different. After the creation of Israel and before the Six Day War in 1967, the Jewish population of Lebanon actually increased. It was the only Middle Eastern country, other than Israel, in which the Jewish numbers rose. With the onset of the 1967 war, however, the majority of Lebanese Jews took flight, most never to return. That's why, says Chatah, the synagogue is so shocking for both tourists and locals.

"They're not expecting it. It's like finding a spaceship in the middle of somewhere."

Engraved above the doorway with the Hebrew words, Beit Haknesset Magen Avraham, the synagogue is surrounded by a fence and secured by a guard who allows onlookers no more than two minutes to peek in from the outside before hurrying them along. Although there have been a few bomb threats, the renovations are scheduled to be finished in early 2010. Chatah says it will most likely be used as a Jewish history museum, rather than a place of worship.

When asked about her feelings toward the new synagogue, Liza's face remains expressionless. "It's just like rebuilding a church or a mosque." A few seconds later, she softens her gaze long enough to add, "But when they open it, I'd like to go in."

The inside of Magen Avraham synagogue.

And although she still might not feel comfortable discussing her roots in open alleyways with North American strangers, perhaps the resurrection of a piece of her past might entice the last Jew in Beirut to feel a little more at ease in her own home.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

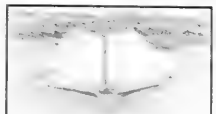
Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

From intention to action

By RABBI AARON LEVY



I recently returned from a conference for rabbis and rabbinical students organized by American Jewish World Service (www.ajws.org), an international, grassroots development organization dedicated to alleviating poverty, hunger and disease among people in the developing world. The central subject of the convention was integrating social justice work into our rabbinates – which is to say, into the ongoing lives of our congregations, campuses and organizations. We discussed methods for engaging our communities in issue education, direct service, effective tzedakah and political advocacy.

I came away from this conference inspired, but inspiration is insufficient. As Jews and as Jewish communities, we – and I include myself in this – talk a great deal about social action and tikkun olam (repairing the world). Our intentions are noble, but good intentions are not enough. To those who need our help for their very survival, it's not thoughts that counts, but our deeds.

In Sifrei Devarim, a third-century CE halachic midrash on Deuteronomy, Rabbi Elazar ben Azariah teaches that if someone loses a coin and a poor person finds it, the person who lost the money is actually considered as if she had given the coin as tzedakah. Although the accidental donor was completely unaware of her own donation – and could not have had any intention whatsoever with regard to this circumstantial contribution – she has still helped support a needy person and thereby performed the mitzvah of tzedakah. The converse is true as well: intention without action doesn't help anyone and isn't a mitzvah.

So where does kavanah – intention, one's inner focus – fit into all this? Kavanah is certainly significant in Judaism, and ideally, we go about our lives constantly fusing action with intention. Furthermore, thoughtfulness and understanding are often practical prerequisites for efficacious action. "A fool cannot be pious," Hillel declared. Kavanah is particularly crucial in prayer, as mindless prayer borders on the meaningless. Maimonides, in the Mishneh Torah, stated it strongly in the 12th century: "Any prayer without kavanah is not prayer."

But in the final analysis, if we must choose one or the other, Judaism clearly values real-world acts over our internal, yet unrealized, plans. "A Jew is asked to take a leap of action rather than a leap of thought," wrote Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel – the prominent 20th-century philosopher and civil rights activist on whose yahrzeit (18 Tevet) I'm writing this column.

In the spirit of Shammai's exhortation to "Say little and do much," I'd like to suggest that we each resolve to spend less time talking about social action and more time doing it, and that we bring the same message to the communities in which we're involved. We each need to ask ourselves: how will I translate my inspiration into action? What am I actually going to do to help alleviate the very real suffering that is widespread both around the globe and in my own backyard?

Unfortunately, the world is beset with so many vast problems, it's easy to feel overwhelmed and abandon any hope of making a difference. But as Ruth Messinger, AJWS' president, often rightly retorts: "We cannot retreat to the luxury of being overwhelmed."

In order to have a real effect in others' lives, we need to pick a limited number of critical issues or organizations in which to get involved in meaningful ways and on a sustained basis. Next, we need to figure out a plan for doing this work. And then, individually and collectively, we need to leap into action.

Rabbi Aaron Levy is spiritual leader of the Kiever Synagogue in Toronto and founding director of Makom: Creative Downtown Judaism.

Not a Jewish Arbor Day at all

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

In a few weeks, we will celebrate the Jewish holiday of Tu b'Shvat. More and more, Tu b'Shvat is being referred to as the Jewish Arbor Day, probably because environmentalism is politically correct and the "greener" religion can become in the modern world, the more politically correct it is.

What seems almost ironic is that when it comes to environmentalism, the modern politically correct world has not yet caught up to Judaism's awareness of nature and its commandments to protect and guard creation. The Jewish obligation toward the environment is constant and not singled out for one day of celebration.

Arbor Day, which usually occurs in April, is a national holiday in the United States founded by J.S. Morgan in 1872. It's traditionally celebrated with picnics, raising the flag, planting a tree, outdoor school bands and collecting paper for recycling. It's a day to raise awareness of the trees.

Tu b'Shvat is a Jewish festival. It's not a day to raise awareness of the trees, but to mark the date on which to count another year passing for the trees. This is why it's sometimes referred to as the Birthday of the Trees.

We count these years because the Torah forbids us to take fruit during the first three years of the tree producing a harvest. For three years, we are to not intrude into its existence, but must respect this new growing creation and allow it to establish itself away from us. The fruit produced in the first three years is called orlah, and it's not kosher for eating.

In many Jewish homes, this commandment has resulted in not cutting a child's hair for the first three years of life, since our children are our fruit and we allow the new creation to establish itself with life and strength.

Once the tree has entered its fourth year, we are commanded to tithe the fruit and bring some of the tithing to Jerusalem and give some of it to the poor. Because there is no Temple today, tithing is affected, but the prohibition of eating orlah remains in place. We need Tu b'Shvat to give us a birthday for the trees, a reference point.

This reference point of counting and then tithing allows us to place ourselves in relation to the trees, to nature, to each other and to God. We may plant the tree, but ultimately it's an independent creation and we're barred from interfering while it establishes its life and its seed. Before we partake of its fruit, we must remember our connection to God and our obligation to each other. Only afterward are we permitted to benefit from the natural bounty.

As is true for any birthday, it can be a day for parties that comes and goes, or it can be a reference point on which we remind ourselves of our maturing relationships and priorities in connection with nature, our spirituality and our fellow human beings.

Our connection to the trees starts on the very day that we are created. We can't resist eating from the Tree of Knowledge, and we're barred from Eden, lest we also eat from the Tree of Life. But even exile from Eden doesn't keep us from being drawn to the trees as we sing of the Torah: "She is a Tree of Life to those who hold her with strength."

On Tu b'Shvat celebrate the trees by remembering the Jewishness of the day and our symbiotic Jewish relationship with trees. There's time for Arbor Day – April is just around the corner.

Ashkelon was a Philistine city

By ALEX GROPPER

Ashkelon has long been an important archeological site along the southern coast of Israel. Although most people associate Ashkelon with the Philistines, it has a venerable history stretching back over five millennia, to the dawn of civilization in the Near East.

Past Forward

The site was mentioned in a number of ancient Egyptian texts, the earliest being the Execration Texts, which date to the early part of the second millennium BCE. Ashkelon is also mentioned in the famous Amarna Letters, the archive of the heretic Pharaoh Akhenaten, who has been called the first monotheist in history.

However, the most famous Egyptian text that mentions Ashkelon is the Merneptah Stela, an inscribed tablet commissioned by Ramses II's son and successor, the pharaoh Merneptah. In this text, Israel is mentioned for the first time in a non-biblical document. It shows us that there was a group called Israel living in the Judean Highlands by the end of the 13th century BCE.

It is around this time that Ashkelon became part of the Philistine pentapolis, or five cities of the Philistine confederacy. It is this confederacy that would be involved in a life and death struggle with the Hebrews as they attempted to take over Canaan. It is as a member of this group that Ashkelon features prominently in the story of Samson and other accounts in the Book of Judges.

Even after its conquest by David, Ashkelon's continuing importance is shown by the fact that it is also mentioned in Assyrian texts of the eighth and seventh century BCE. In the seventh century BCE, Ashkelon was part of what some historians have called the world's first major free-trade zone, the Assyrian Empire.

Ashkelon's strategic location along the southern coast of Israel has made it a crucial site in the power struggles that have convulsed the region since the dawn of civilization. The numerous excavations at Ashkelon over the past century have verified its historical significance.

It was in the 1920s, under the British Mandate, that large-scale excavations of the site were first undertaken. The person in charge was John Garstang, who would become famous shortly thereafter as director of excavations at Jericho, where he claimed to have found evidence of Joshua's destruction of its walls. That was disputed in the 1950s by the renowned English archeologist Kathleen Kenyon.

Interestingly, I was almost involved in excavating Ashkelon. In the early 1980, my friend, the eminent Egyptologist Donald Redford, was interested in excavating a site in Israel with strong Egyptian connections. Ashkelon would have fit the bill perfectly. Because of my involvement at the City of David excavations in Jerusalem and Redford's reputation, the director, Yigal Shiloh, who would become the head of the Institute of Archaeology at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, lobbied on our behalf with the department of antiquities. However while Redford was considering the possibilities, Lawrence Stager of Harvard University made his move and got the excavation permit.

Stager would come up with some spectacular and intriguing discoveries. Among his finds was an intact city gate from the Middle Bronze Age, circa 1700 BCE. It was an amazing discovery.

Stager also came up with an interesting thesis regarding the Philistines. He noticed that during their habitation of the city, the amount of pork consumed increased dramatically, while in the Judean Highlands, where the Israelites were settling down, there was virtually no consumption of pork. What makes this so intriguing is that the highlands were covered with oak forests at the time. The oak seeds, or acorns, are the natural and preferred diet of pigs.

It's fascinating to see that more than 3,000 years ago, the prohibition of pork had already emerged as a cultural marker that would set us apart from other nations.

Cholent: recipes and more, Pt. 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week we looked at the history of cholent, the uniquely Jewish stew that is traditionally cooked on Friday and left to simmer that night to be enjoyed on Shabbat afternoon. Although cholent may not seem to be exotic fare, there are countless varieties and many closely held recipes. Thankfully, on the web, people share their cholent.

The Jewish Highway

Start off at the RFCJ Archives, where you'll find a variety, including North African T'fina Speenak, Kurdistan Hamin, Rib-Sticking and Lo-Cal [bit.ly/chol08] From there, continue to the bubbe of all cholent lists, the Jewish-Food Cholent Archives. At last count, there were enough recipes for every Shabbat for a year. There's Moroccan Dafina, Hungarian Shalet and Nyana Choma. But if you're really daring, why not try Chocolate or Yogurt Curry Cholent! [bit.ly/chol09]

George Erdosh has a lovely – and loving – history of enjoying his family cholent in Hungary before World War II. He also offers great tips about the ingredients and flavouring, and ends with practical cholent advice I hadn't seen in other sites. [bit.ly/chol25]

It's not uncommon to enjoy a cholent while downing an alcoholic beverage or two. But instead of washing down your cholent with a drink, why not pour it into your cholent? Cantor Joel Kessler of Adas Kodesch Shel Emeth in Wilmington, Del., has graciously supplied his recipe for Beer Cholent. [bit.ly/chol26]

Or you may want to try yaptzok, a Polish potato cholent where nary is a bean is found. (I grew up on yaptzok and it is dear to my heart. So I don't even want to get into the controversy over whether this is a genuine cholent or merely a variation of a potato kugel!) [bit.ly/chol15]

For more mouth-watering variations, take a look at Oded Schwartz's Cholent (Hamin) – The Ultimate Shabbat Food. [bit.ly/chol16] And if you're game for something a bit different, try a Bison Cholent. [bit.ly/chol17]

The Cholent Mix blog is "written by cholent enthusiasts for cholent enthusiasts." Blogger Velvel shares his Cholent Philosophy: "There are four necessary ingredients in my cholent. If any of these are missing, it's not cholent: meat, beans, barley, potatoes. I prefer the addition of the following ingredients, but Weight-Watchers dietary restrictions, spicy-heat tolerance and common sense of my wife may limit these: kishke, bourbon/beer, hot peppers, liquid smoke and maple syrup or honey." [bit.ly/chol18]

While some people wouldn't deem their cholent worthy to eat unless pieces of chicken are floating in it, non-carnivores have not been forgotten. You can try a vegetarian version with lima and kidney beans, cauliflower and zucchini. [bit.ly/chol10] There's another that calls for tofu and shiitake mushrooms. [bit.ly/chol11] and a vegan variety, too. [bit.ly/chol12]

Although it is certainly handy to be able to print out a recipe, nothing beats watching an expert cholent-maker at work. There are plenty of cholent how-to videos on YouTube [bit.ly/chol19] as well as some cholent-related musical performances. [bit.ly/chol21]

It sounds perplexing to me, but it seems there are instances when Shabbat ends yet some cholent remains uneaten. Amotherinisrael.com has recommendations for cholent leftovers:

- In soup. Small amounts of cholent, raw or cooked vegetables, gravy and other tidbits can be stored in a container in the freezer and added to from time to time.
- In calzones. Put a spoonful of cholent in a square of pizza dough. Fold the dough over to make a triangle, and bake.
- The following week. That is after heating the cholent to boiling, putting it in a jar, letting it cool and screwing the top tight. [bit.ly/chol27]

Food writer Claudia Roden tracked down a poem titled Princess Sabbath in which 19th-century German poet Heinrich Heine extols the transcendent qualities of the mighty dish.

Cholent, ray of light immortal!…
For this cholent is the very
Food of heaven, which on Sinai,
God Himself instructed Moses
In the secret of preparing. [bit.ly/chol23]

Cholent has withstood the test of time and may very well be immortal. You, however, should be more vigilant, lest you succumb to Death by Cholent. [bit.ly/chol24]

Media looks to Israel on airport security

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Two-and-a-half years ago, Israeli analyst Manfred Gerstenfeld wrote an essay for the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs titled What the West Should Learn from the Assault on Israel and the Jews.

This was at a time, Gerstenfeld noted, when European leaders, confronting mounting threats from Islamists, were starting to rely increasingly on Israel for its expertise in security-related matters.

Gerstenfeld wrote: "European security models in many places are often partly based on Israeli ones, because Israelis have frequently been targeted.

"For instance, in the West not so many decades ago, one could board a plane without a security check. At the time, such checks were already the norm in Israel. El Al's security approach has become a model for many other airlines… In anticipation of the summer 2007 travel season, directors from a variety of American airports visited Israel to study its successful passenger-screening system. Such visits are frequent, but only few make the newspapers."

But that certainly changed after Christmas Day, when a Nigerian, allegedly working for Al Qaeda, tried to blow up a Detroit-bound airliner, resulting in a massive security clampdown at airports in the United States and around the world. The chaos caused during the busy holiday travel season prompted an outpouring of media stories on how the West might benefit from Israel's security expertise.

Attempted Christmas Day bombing changes perceptions

In "What Israel can teach us about security" (Toronto Star, Dec. 31), Cathal Kelly began his article with the following contrast: "While North America's airports groan under the weight of another sea-change in security protocols, one word keeps popping out of the mouths of experts: Israelification. That is, how can we make our airports more like Israel's, which deal with far greater terror threats with far less inconvenience."

Drawing upon the expertise of Israeli airport security consultant Rafi Sela, Kelly described Israel's approach to co-ordinated intelligence gathering and the multiple layers of security checks at Ben-Gurion airport that screen for suspicious individuals while allowing the vast majority of air travellers to move relatively quickly through the lines and onto the planes.

Why isn't the same system used in North America, he asked. Sela's answer: a rigid bureaucracy that relies on the wrong security concepts.

On CTV National News Jan. 4, anchor Tom Clark introduced a similar report: "While many countries look to toughen up airport security through body scanners and baggage searches, some suggest there's a lesson to be learned from Israel. It has faced countless threats since it came into existence more than six decades ago. CTV's Scott Laurie looks at why Israel has been so successful in stopping terror in the skies and whether its methods could work here."

Laurie noted: "Instead of just relying on technology, wands and scanners, security [in Israel] involves up-close and personal interrogation."

Laurie interviewed airport security consultant Rafi Ron, who spoke about the successful screening technique used at Israel's Ben-Gurion International Airport: "What we are looking for are people that exhibit a behavioural indicator that may be related to their intention to carry out a violent act… We've developed a program called behaviour pattern recognition."

Contrary to popular misconception, this is not, strictly speaking, racial profiling. On several U.S. news programs, Ron explained that many years ago, Ben-Gurion airport was attacked by Japanese and German terrorist gangs working on behalf of radical Palestinian groups. So Israeli experts are aware of the fact that a terrorist threat can come from people of various backgrounds and nationalities, which is what "behaviour pattern recognition" is meant to detect (in addition to the pre-screening inquiries that are routinely undertaken of all passengers on a flight list).

These measures could be adopted at airports in Canada and around the world. This point was made in "Focus On Passenger Behaviour: Israeli Expert," by Glen McGregor (National Post, Jan. 4).

McGregor also turned to Sela, who explained that an airport can't function if its security systems treat the vast majority of travellers as potential terrorists: "You have to actually look for the things that are dangerous and not just scan everybody… This calls for a total change in approach to the transportation security issue," Sela said.

Israel is showing the world what this total change involves. Some, as Gerstenfeld noted back in 2007, have started to pay close attention. Others, one would assume, are sure to follow now.

An unlikely reunion after sixty years

By Dan Horowitz

Television has been referred to as a "vast wasteland". But for 84-year-old Torontonian and Holocaust survivor Gerda Frieberg, television recently served as a portal into her past.

It was 5 a.m. when Gerda, a past chair of Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region, a member of United Jewish Appeal's Atarah Division and, in 1985, the founding chair of UJA's Holocaust Education Centre, unable to sleep, turned on the set to help pass the time from dark to light.

It was then, sitting on the couch, that she began flipping from channel to channel when, suddenly, she saw a face - a face that took her back more than 60 years.

It was the face of renowned artist Samuel Bak, now 76, a man who Gerda had first met during her time in a Displaced Persons Camp in the German town of Landsberg from 1945 to 1949.

She still remembered Samuel as the fresh-faced young boy of 12 or 13 who accompanied his mother on her regular visits to Gerda - the camp's consummate seamstress - who made many of her clothes.

With every visit to Gerda, Samuel's mom expressed how she yearned for him to be able to showcase his remarkable gift as a painter. She worried that he might never have the opportunity to fully tap into his talents as the times were uncertain, to say the least.

"She was always talking about her son," remembers Gerda. "She would tell me how talented he was and how she was determined to get Samuel into an art school in Munich. Nothing was more important; she just knew he would become a great artist given the opportunity. I often wondered over the years what ever happened to her son."

Now, thanks to the show on Bravo early that morning, which highlighted Samuel Bak and many of his paintings depicting the Holocaust, Gerda's questions were finally answered.

But it was one painting in particular that caught Gerda's attention.

One of the last paintings shown was, as Samuel explained to the host, from that same Landsberg DP Camp where Gerda first met little Samuel.

"This is when I first realized that the artist on this television show could be the son of my old customer," recalls Gerda. "That prompted me to wait for the credits to roll where I found the artist's name and the gallery that represented him."

For the past 40 years, many of Bak's works have been on display at the prestigious Pucker Gallery in Boston, Massachusetts.

"Would you by any chance be the young boy I met in Landsberg?" Gerda wrote in a letter to Samuel after seeing the show. "If so, then your mother's dream came through; she must have been so proud of you, as any mother would be. I would very much like to hear from you...."

This summer, soon after sending the letter, Gerda was on a plane to Boston to connect with the successful artist.

Toronto's Gerda Frieberg recently reunited with artist Samuel Bak after 60 years.

"I had always thought about Samuel, and wanted to reconnect with him after all these years," says Gerda. "But, until that television show, I couldn't remember his last name. Every time I saw a painting depicting the Holocaust, I thought it might be his. I was never sure, but always curious. Now, I finally knew for sure."

Gerda, so impressed with her friend's work, is in the midst of trying to bring Bak's exhibit to Toronto.

And what did Samuel think of seeing his mother's former seamstress after more than six decades?

"Gerda has the most exceptional energy; her incredible spirit and energy are jaw-dropping," says Bak. "Very few people could have gone through what she did and then go on to live the extraordinary life she did. She is truly an exceptional lady."

"Samuel could have been one amongst the millions to perish in the Holocaust, but instead, look what he became; look what he has contributed," marvels Gerda. "He became an important, famous painter, relaying the essential stories of the Holocaust through his paintings and what could be more important than that?"

High school students offered a head start

By Sally Szuster

High school students readying for their first year of post-secondary education now have a unique opportunity to explore their personal relationship with Israel and prepare for the challenges of campus life.

Students in their final two years of high school can sign up for a six-session program that will engage them in an in-depth exploration of current issues, giving them the resources they will need to effectively deal with anti-Israeli sentiment and anti-Semitism on campus. The program, called Campus Ahead, will be launched on Monday, January 18 at 6:30 pm at Beth Sholom Synagogue in Toronto and will include a performance by acclaimed beat poet, the Hebrew Mamita. Other sessions will include speakers addressing the new anti-Semitism, including Jeff Robbins, a former member of the United Nations Human Rights Commission.

"Jewish students on Canadian campuses have encountered alarming incidents of anti-Semitism and hostility towards Israel which can often make them feel deeply uncomfortable," said Susan Davis, executive vice president of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA). "Our goal is to empower them before they arrive on campus, so that they are prepared to fully engage in student life with confidence."

"We often encounter students who, upon arriving on campus during their first year, feel conflicted and distressed by deliberate attempts to demonize Israel and antagonize Jewish and Zionist students," said Zac Kaye, executive director, Hillel of Greater Toronto, UJA Federation's campus organization. "This proactive approach will certainly ease students' transition onto campuses."

The initiative is part of a national collaboration between Canadian Council of Conservative Synagogues, Hillel of Greater Toronto, Hillel Montreal, National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL) and the University Outreach Committee (UOC) of CIJA. Sessions will take place in both Toronto and Montreal.

University and college campuses have, over the past several years, faced growing anti-Israel campaigns such as Israel Apartheid Week, attempted boycotts of Israeli academics, and conferences designed to undermine Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state. Jewish students, supported by the coordinated efforts of Jewish organizations, many of them affiliated with UJA Federation, have been on the frontline of countering these efforts.

Daniel Ferman, city-wide student president of Hillel of Greater Toronto, knows first hand how important it is for Jewish students to be engaged in campus life. "It's very important for students to be informed even if they don't feel strongly about becoming politically engaged," said Ferman. "Being informed means that they will feel more confident, knowing where they can turn to when they encounter anti-Semitic and anti-Israel behaviour."

"Campus Ahead is a wonderful opportunity for high school students to develop their leadership skills and discuss challenging issues in an inclusive and safe environment," said Morley Goldberg of the Canadian Council of Conservative Synagogues.

A special briefing for parents of students who are preparing for university with community leaders will also be offered on February 7 at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life.

We must stand up for Israel

By DANA GOLD

I've been asked by many people where my passion for Israel comes from. I've joined clubs on campus and political movements, and I spend every summer in Israel. That passion may seem a little crazy, but it isn't.

Guest Voice

I'm honoured to have been raised for most of my life in Canada. But I feel proud and privileged to have been born in Israel.

I was born on April 10, 1988, in a hospital in Afula, where my mother worked as a doctor. Afula was close to our home in Nazareth Illit, the small, mostly Jewish city adjacent to the mostly Arab city of Nazareth. My family now lives in Haifa.

As new immigrants from Romania still in their 20s, my parents were building a family and finding work. They weren't prepared for what was to come, namely, the difficult period of the first intifadah from 1987 to 1993.

There was a great deal of tension between the Arabs of Nazareth and the Jews of Nazareth Illit. On occasion, the Arabs came into our community, threw stones, chanted slurs and verbally, and even physically assaulted Jewish residents.

My parents, too, were victims of that behaviour. Because they were still recent immigrants, they did not quite know how to deal with the situation, even though Romania was well-known for its rampant anti-Semitism.

In 1990, Israel was dragged into the Gulf War by Saddam Hussein. Although Israel was not directly involved in the war, Iraq launched SCUD missiles against Israel to goad the Jewish state into retaliating and thus try to break up the American-led, mostly Muslim, coalition against him.

It was feared that the Iraqis would use biological and chemical weapons. Israeli citizens had to be prepared. Like all Israelis, my parents taped over the doors and the windows, to ensure that no outside and potentially lethal air would enter the apartment. We would sit for hours enclosed in a small space, listening to the radio and watching the television. We couldn't leave until the government said it was safe to do so.

We also had to wear gas masks during the war. It is a memory I still retain. Since I was a young child at the time, my mask was quite different than those worn by adults. It covered most of my body, had a disgusting smell, and I could hear myself breathe.

I was only three years old. I refused to wear the mask.

My dad would tell me, "Dana, you have to wear it." But I was stubborn; I still refused. Finally, he would say, "If you don't wear it, you will die."

I suppose that persuaded me, because after that I put it on and kept quiet.

I am proud of my Jewish heritage

During the war my father served in the Israel Defence Forces, in the Totkhanim, the artillery division. One night, without warning, he was commanded to pack his bags and go to the base. He wasn't allowed to tell my mother or me where he was going or what he was doing. He didn't even really know himself. He was told only to inform his family that he would be gone for a while. He was worried about leaving us alone.

To this day, I remember the sirens sounding during the war.

I didn't know why they went off, nor do I recall now how often they went off. The sound was distinct, not like an ambulance or firetruck, but slower and much louder.

Eventually, my father did return home. But it was a worrisome time for everyone in Israel. No one knew then what the outcome of the war would be.

Luckily, Israel didn't go to war, and apart from the SCUD rockets that fell on the country, the Jewish state emerged relatively unharmed.

A few months later, the rest of my family moved from Romania to Israel and settled in Haifa. My parents and I joined them. We lived in Haifa until we came to Canada.

As a small country situated among enemies, Israel needs international support. Especially with the threat of Iran, Israeli soldiers need to know that they are risking their lives for a cause. They are fighting terror not just for themselves, but for Jews around the world.

I have always felt a close connection to Israel, and I will always do my utmost to assist it in its survival, no matter what others say about it.

When someone asks me why I defend Israel, I know what to say. I am proud of my Jewish heritage and of Israeli identity, and I will never forget that I must stand up for both.

Dana Gold is a student at the University of Western Ontario.

North Americans and Israelis clash over haredi hegemony

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

A string of controversies has reignited the pluralism wars, prompting a loose alliance of U.S. and Israeli Jews to wage a renewed campaign against Orthodox control in the Jewish state.

Among the litany of developments making headlines: the arrest of a woman for wearing a prayer shawl at the Western Wall; protests by haredim against a parking lot open on the Sabbath and against the Intel branch in Jerusalem for working through the Sabbath; a battle over gender-segregated public buses; and the burial in Spain of a child converted to Judaism by a Conservative rabbi in a corner of a cemetery reserved for non-Jews.

In response, activists have organized protests in Israel and the United States against the perceived hegemony in Israel of haredi-aligned rabbis. Organizers say that their goal is to keep Jews caring about Judaism and Israel, despite what they describe as the increasingly alienating behaviour of Israel's Orthodox religious authorities and members of the country's haredi population.

"It's more of the same, unfortunately, and part of a much larger picture of the increased polarization and increased strength of the haredi groups that are creating enormous havoc in Israel," said Rabbi Philip Scheim of Toronto's Conservative Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue.

Rabbi Phillip Scheim

Rabbi Ed Elkin, spiritual leader of Toronto's First Narayever Congregation, a traditional egalitarian congregation, told The CJN in his capacity as chair of the Reform Rabbis of Greater Toronto that "we definitely stand for Jewish pluralism and tolerance and mutual respect."

Rabbi David Seed, associate rabbi of Adath Israel Congregation and president of the Conservative movement's Rabbinical Assembly, Ontario region, wasn't aware of any protests taking place in Canada when contacted last week, but he said the movement offers support to Masorti shuls in Israel.

The recent incidents reflect longstanding issues, he said.

In Israel, however, "people are saying enough is enough," said Andrew Sacks, director of the Israel branch of the Rabbinical Assembly. "You have a segment of the American Jewish community that cares deeply enough to want to change it, but you have a second, less desirable effect, among younger people especially, that says if that's what Israel is all about, I don't want any part of it."

Rabbi David Seed

Rabbi Jacqueline Koch Ellenson, who directs the Women's Rabbinic Network, helped organize a day of solidarity and support of Women of the Wall on Dec. 17 that encouraged Jewish women across the United States to hold meetings, read from the Torah or pray in support of women who choose to pray at the Western Wall, including those who wear religious vestments. Another group organized a similar protest in San Francisco on Jan. 10.

"It is not 'Love Israel, right or wrong,' or 'I can't be connected,'" she said. "We need to look at the complexities of this country that we love. We can't reject it, nor can we be silent when there are issues that require our involvement."

Activists on both sides see the Western Wall as something of a battlefront. In recent years, the site's government-funded Orthodox rabbinate has banned mixed groups from singing, an action that precludes Jewish youth groups from a tradition of bursting into Hatikvah to celebrate the wall's return to Jewish control in 1967.

One protest against the Orthodox monopoly took place in Jerusalem on the evening of Nov. 28. Protesters marched from Paris Square to Zion Square in Jerusalem's city centre, carrying signs that read "Iran is here – we're sick of haredi violence," "Jerusalem will not fall," and "We are sick of [religious] coercion."

Nofrat Frenkel, whose arrest at the Western Wall for wearing a tallit a couple of weeks before helped spur the demonstration, delivered a message that explicitly addressed the threat of the alienation of Diaspora Jews from Israel and religion.

Michael Oren, the Israeli ambassador to Washington, told an audience of Conservative movement leaders that Frenkel was "led away" from the Wall, not arrested, the Forward reported. He later issued a statement correcting the misimpression and confirming that Frenkel was, indeed, arrested.

The flurry of controversies in Israel come at a time when American Jewish pluralism has become more expansive than ever. Guests at the White House Chanukah party ranged from Chabad rabbis to Rabbi Sharon Kleinbaum, who heads Beth Simchat Torah, a gay synagogue in New York.

Some groups, particularly among the Orthodox, reject the activism as Americans imposing their mores on Israel.

Israel "is a country that has functioned with a certain understanding among its religious and not-religious Jews," said Rabbi Avi Shafran, spokesperson for Agudath Israel of America. "If the activists don't want to alienate Jews, they shouldn't thumb their noses at the traditional Jews in Israel."

Rabbi Shafran also noted that the most vocal haredi protesters were minorities within their own communities. Much has been made of the continued protests outside Intel's offices, but these were sharply reduced in number after a compromise in November that allowed non-Jewish workers to work through the Sabbath. But this has gone unnoticed, Rabbi Shafran said.

"The main haredi groups were in favour of the compromise, but there are always holdouts," he said.

Other American Orthodox leaders, however, fret about the possibility of alienation from Israel. They note that alienation could extend even to the modern Orthodox, because of a recent crisis in conversion policy that has threatened to discredit the majority of Orthodox converts.

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler of Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, prefers to say that there may be "an element of discomfort" in the modern Orthodox community. He feels the word "alienation" is too strong, and implies a lack of ownership.

"I'm not sure about other movements. I hope it's not true," he said.

Coast to Coast

'We should avoid provocation when it's not necessary'

The issues at the Kotel are specific to Israel, because, in the Diaspora, "we can each have our own shul," Rabbi Strauchler said.

He added that there is "something a little ironic" about about the fact that similar issues – sinat chinam, or baseless hatred – are said to have caused the destruction of the Second Temple when it existed.

Rabbi Strauchler advocates that all Jews should become more machmir (stringent) about ahavat Yisrael (loving one's fellow Jews).

"I think all too often we see good in ritual, not in day-to-day ethical decisions we have to make."

It's "not an obligation, but not a crime in any way" for a woman to wear a tallit, he noted. However, he added, "I wasn't there to know the full context."

He said he's in favour of "creative thinking" that would encourage tolerance. "We should try to understand that we are different, and avoid provocation when it's not necessary."

Rabbi Avi Weiss, who heads the Amcha activism group and Yeshivat Chovevei Torah, a liberal modern Orthodox seminary in New York City, called for dialogue. "The greatest threat facing us, more than external enemy, is a divisiveness within our people that is so dangerous, God forbid, it could lead to calamity," he said.

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler

Weiss noted that Orthodox authorities defend their actions by citing chumrah – the strict application of Jewish law. "In a world of chumrah, there's got to be a stress on the chumrah of ahavat Yisrael," the love of the Jewish People, Weiss said.

Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, said Israel was suffering periodic social pangs that arise when there is relative peace, and suggested that these need to be addressed from within, and not due to U.S. Jewish pressure.

"Every time there's a lull in daily threats of terrorist acts, normal life brings to the fore many of these unresolved social tensions," he said.

"Some of them impact on relations with Diaspora Jews, but it's more important for Israelis to deal with them because of their own need of religious tolerance than because of the Americans' need."

The New Israel Fund (NIF), a group that has long advocated for a role for Diaspora Jews in making the case for pluralism, welcomed the attention on the issues, said its Washington, D.C.-based spokesperson, Naomi Paiss.

In Canada, the situation is somewhat different. "We're independent," explained Jay Brodbar, executive director of the New Israel Fund of Canada. "A charitable organization in Canada, especially with respect to international activity, can't participate in anything that would be considered advocacy or political.

"One of the things we can do is educate Canadians about the issue. We do that. We make them aware that this is a potential issue that concerns them as well."

Speaking as an individual – "a Canadian Jew who cares about Israel and my own Jewish identity as well as those of my community – this is an example of something much bigger… a greater number of people is being affected by a smaller number of decision makers who are often arbitrary."

"The whole premise of the New Israel Fund is that you can love Israel and you can fix it," Paiss said. "The Israeli government has a special responsibility – what is made law in Israel signifies the closest we have to a religious ruling, even for those of us who don't live in Israel. We American Jews do take this personally, and we should."

An example was the 13-year-old boy who died recently in Madrid. The order to bury him in a segregated corner of the Jewish cemetery came from Rabbi Shlomo Amar, Israel's chief Sephardi rabbi.

NIF is currently organizing a petition drive among Jews in Israel and the Diaspora urging Yisrael Katz, Israel's transportation minister, to ban publicly funded buses from segregating male and female passengers.

"If he yields to haredi pressure, we expect to become louder in response both here and in Israel," Paiss said. "We will use every means at our disposal to educate the American public about the issue."

Muslim paper apologizes for 'organ harvesting' article

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

A B.C. Muslim newspaper has apologized to Canada's Jewish community for posting an article on its website claiming that Israel kidnaps Ukrainian children to harvest their organs.

The article, which originated from Press TV, Iran's television network, appeared in al-Ameen's print edition some three weeks ago and stated that Israel has kidnapped 25,000 Ukrainian children to be used for "spare parts."

Al-Ameen, a non-profit bi-weekly paper distributed for free in B.C. mosques and Islamic centres, was criticized by several Jewish organizations last week for publishing the article, which has since been removed from the paper's website.

"It's very disappointing when the editor of a publication in this country actually feels that there may be merit to a blood libel story," said Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada.

B'nai Brith issued a press release last week condemning the article and noting that Press TV was "the official mouthpiece of the terrorist-sponsoring Iranian regime."

"I think all Canadians should be very frightened to know that people in the media, in this country... would be willing to accept stories from other sources that are so vile, so racist and so untrue," Dimant said.

"We are absolutely disappointed that those who run the mosques didn't throw out the publication."

Mohammed Bhamji, al-Ameen's managing editor, said he assumed the article from Press TV was factual.

"It's a mistake that we made. We took an article from some place assuming that it was true and fact," he said. "It was untrue. It's come to our attention... we've pulled it off our website."

The public apology, which was posted on the paper's website and in its print edition, states that al-Ameen "extends its honest and sincere apology to our fellow Jewish Canadians for any hurt which may have [been] caused by us publishing or communicating such a news article."

The apology goes on to say that al-Ameen won't defend the news article, because it would mean "causing further divide in our harmonious multicultural fabric – but it is needless to say that the issue of 'organ harvesting in Israel' was being discussed at the time of our last publication, by major media outlets, and not just al-Ameen."

Dimant said the apology was insufficient.

"The fact that he even thinks that there is any kind of legitimacy to this horrific blood libel is frightening," he said.

Len Rudner, Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario regional director, called the article a "piece of lying garbage."

"Articles like this nourish small minds. It encourages people to believe the worst of other communities," he said.

In its news release, B'nai Brith stated that the members of al-Ameen's editorial board are also members of the British Columbia Muslim Association's (BCMA) executive board, which runs eight mosques and a government-funded school.

Both the BCMA and al-Ameen have said that although some editorial staff may be members of the Muslim organization, the BCMA isn't affiliated with the newspaper.

Dimant said the paper's website had stated that the two organizations were linked, but the information has been removed.

Getting motivated in 2010

Everyone self-motivates for the New Year, and our resolve usually lasts a good two weeks if we are lucky.

So I was wondering; where does one find inspiration to truly change and to make your own world, as well as the world at large, a better place? Sometimes you don't have to look so far to find inspiration. The biggest role models might be right in front of you.

Orthodox conversion dispute goes public

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Mainstream Orthodox congregational rabbis in Montreal allege that the haredi-dominated Vaad Ha'ir is trying to undermine their authority in conducting conversions, dissuading prospective converts to Judaism from going to them and influencing the chief rabbinate of Israel that their conversions are not as halachically sound as those of the Vaad.

A dispute that has been brewing for a few years has become public with a letter signed by six rabbis of major Orthodox synagogues, including the Montreal president of the Rabbinical Council of Canada (RCC), and published in The CJN Jan. 7, that's critical of the U.S.-based organization Eternal Jewish Family (EJF), with which the Vaad is associated.

Vaad executive director Rabbi Saul Emanuel said he wasn't aware of any defamation of the RCC rabbis. "I see no bad feelings whatsoever," he said.

The letter was issued in the wake of the resignation last month of EJF director and founder Rabbi Leib Tropper, who reportedly had an improper relationship with a woman he was converting. Audiotapes of his phone conversations with the woman suggestive of sexual relations between himself and her, and possibly other men he knew, were posted on the YouTube website.

The six Montreal rabbis who signed the letter, as well as Rabbi Reuben Poupko, believe that this revelation is evidence that EJF is not a credible organization and that the Vaad, in Rabbi Poupko's words, shows "poor judgment" in aligning with it.

The Vaad's Rabbi Emanuel said the association is more accurately described as the independent EJF's "endorsing us, rather than the Vaad choosing to affiliate with EJF" and that approval is due to the Vaad having built up "an exceptionally good reputation around the world over many years. Its conversion program been used as a model by other communities."

He added, "We are not taking any instruction from EJF. All we've done is attend its conferences."

Rabbi Poupko, of Congregation Beth Israel Beth Aaron, said the issue is not that the mainstream rabbis object to the Vaad doing conversions, it is that they want the "delegitimization" of those performed by RCC-affiliated rabbis to stop.

Rabbi Poupko feels the Vaad and EJF are co-operating to wrest Orthodox conversion out of the hands of the mainstream rabbinate. "EJF and the Vaad are working hand-in-glove. The Vaad has touted its endorsement by EJF like the Good Housekeeping seal of approval."

The mainstream Orthodox rabbis contend the dispute is not about standards, but rather politics and power.

Rabbi Michael Whitman, one of the signatories to the letter, said EJF began "bad-mouthing" the RCC's conversions almost immediately after the RCC's Montreal branch founded its own beit din for conversions. "Their agenda is not to improve conversions or to establish universal standards... It's to establish who is in and who is out. They want haredim in charge of conversions and no synagogue rabbis involved... Not only do they not accept us, they bad-mouth us."

They think it would be wise for the Vaad to reconsider its association with EJF, which was founded by Rabbi Tropper in 2005 as an independent organization in Suffern, N.Y., with funding from a private U.S. philanthropist. According to its public information, the EJF's goal is to standardize conversion procedures, ensuring that they strictly adhere to Jewish law and are acceptable to Israel's chief rabbinate, which has the power to deem who is a Jew in Israel.

The batei din of the Vaad, as well as of those headed by Rabbi Dovid Shochet in Toronto and Rabbi Avraham Feigelstock in Vancouver, are among the 19 rabbinical courts in the world endorsed by ETJ as meeting "universally accepted standards."

The EJF website page that listed endorsed batei din was altered slightly last week with the addition: "This list does not imply that other batei din are not reliable."

EJF's leading halachic overseer is Rabbi Reuven Feinstein, who has reaffirmed the organization's mission.

About six years ago, the RCC-affiliated rabbinate in Montreal formed its own beit din for conversions, Rabbi Whitman said, with the approval of the then-chief rabbi of the Vaad's beit din, the late Rabbi Avraham David Niznik. Up until then, most Orthodox conversions had been done by individual rabbis, Rabbi Whitman said, but it was felt a more centralized approach would be better.

RCC converts are accepted in Israel today, Rabbi Whitman said, but it may take some persuasion.

"The situation in Israel is terribly political and the chief rabbinate is not a bastion of integrity. If you ask someone there if our converts are accepted, they will say no. If you ask someone else they say OK. It takes repeated phone calls. The bottom line is they are accepted, but with effort."

Winnipeg couple celebrates 70 years

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — It was the last day of the year in 1939, and David Peltz and Elka Lichtman, both from Zamosc in western Poland, were among a group of Jews fleeing eastward into Russia to escape the Nazis.

They were one of 12 couples who hurriedly married on Dec. 31.

Last week, with family in attendance, David, 94, and Elka Peltz, 98, celebrated their 70th wedding anniversary at the Sharon Home, where they've been residents since June 2009.

David and Elka knew each other before the war, as Elka was friends with David's older sister.

When World War II broke out in 1939, the 23-year-old Peltz was in the Polish army. After Poland was defeated, Peltz went home to Zamosc.

"The Germans had occupied our town for a short period, then gave way to the Russians," he recalls. "When I heard that the Germans were coming back, I didn't feel safe staying there. I decided to take a train to Lvov in Ukraine, where I had relatives."

Elka had seen what the Germans were capable of when they occupied the town the first time and, therefore, also wanted to leave. She had two brothers living in Lvov, so David invited her to come with him. When they arrived in the city, they found that her brothers were sleeping on the floor of a poor woman's house.

"It wasn't considered proper at that time for a young woman to be sleeping on the floor with her brothers," Peltz says. "I asked my relative if Elka could stay, which she did, and she ended up sharing a bed with my cousin's daughter."

After a time, the Russians ordered all foreign nationals deeper into Russia. It was during that journey that the Peltzes were married, with a traditional ceremony and under a chupah.

"The officials told us they were going to relocate us to other cities," David recalls. "Instead, they dumped us in the bush. The group of us spent the winter of 1940 living in the bush. We were city people. We weren't used to the bush."

In the spring, the group tried to go back to the Polish border. The Communists took a dim view of such individual initiative. They loaded everyone into boxcars and shipped them off to Siberia, where David and Elka spent the next two winters.

Their fortunes changed later in 1942, however, when they were moved to the city of Leninabad (now Khujand) in Tajikistan, in central Asia. "We had a beautiful life in Leninabad for a couple of years," David says. The weather was warm, and he found work in a tannery as a supervisor.

His father had been a buyer of rawhides, so Peltz knew the business. "I had eight or nine people working for me," he says. "We were producing 700 pieces a day."

At war's end, the Peltzes returned to Zamosc to search for surviving family members. David was the only survivor from his family. Elka still had two brothers, one of whom, Sam Lichtman, had been brought to Winnipeg by a relative. The other brother, Edward, ended up in Australia.

After the Peltzes spent some time in a displaced persons' camp in Germany, Elka's brother, Sam, brought the family, including three daughters, to Winnipeg in 1950.

For a short time, David worked in a tannery and then as a wholesale grocer, while Elka (now known as Ellen), a dressmaker, sewed jacket linings at home. Ultimately, they were able to scrape together enough money to buy a corner grocery store at Hargrave Street and Assiniboine Avenue in downtown Winnipeg. The family lived above the store, Ellen worked in the store with David, and the family kept a Jewish home.

In the mid-1970s, the Peltzes' building was expropriated by the city to build a highrise and David and Ellen moved to suburbia in north Winnipeg.

While not a religious man, David is a Yiddishist. He readily shares the many poems that he has written over the years. He has read some of them on a Jewish radio program.

Upon retiring, he became an active participant in the H. Leivick Yiddish-speaking B'nai Brith Lodge and the Mamaloshen Group. Enjoying singing lead him to the Stay Young (Jewish seniors group) and United Jewish People's Order choirs. For many years, he and Ellen participated and enjoyed the programs at the Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre.

Both Peltzes are in relatively good health and are still mobile. They raised four daughters, one of whom, Anne, was killed in a car accident in 1973. Sonia lives in Winnipeg with her husband, Harold Kaplan; Esther lives in Calgary with her husband, Sam Plucer; and Shelley lives in North Carolina with her husband, Steve Davis. The Peltzes have five grandchildren and two great-grandchildren.

Though the Peltzes are still adjusting to their new surroundings at the Sharon Home, they say they feel grateful that there is such a facility available in the community where they can enjoy Jewish culture in a facility that offers kosher food.

War vets need youth to continue legacy

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Sol Zulauf is a World War II veteran with dementia.

He can't remember every detail from the war, but he knows why his story needs to be told.

"It's important," he said in his Toronto home. Over and over again, he repeated the phrase.

Zulauf, 87, signed up for the war when he was 19 years old. He wanted to join the air force, but was colour-blind. Instead, he joined the infantry and later the Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, where he helped with the supply and maintenance of weaponry.

Sitting on his couch, gazing into space, Zulauf slowly shared some of his memories.

"I forget a lot, I remember a lot," he said.

A few details take him awhile to remember, others, like his time on potato peeling duty, come with ease.

"I was peeling spuds in England," he said, later admitting, through giggles, that he was put on potato duty for running off to go skating with a girl.

"All of a sudden you hear a noise. I didn't know what the noise was. I thought it was a flying bomb," he said, adding that he jumped up from his seat to look out the window.

Debra Stuart is helping her father, Sol Zulauf, share his war stories through the Jewish War Veterans of Canada.

Zulauf turned out to be right. The force of the bomb knocked out the glass of the kitchen window. If the soldier hadn't moved from his chair, he would have been covered in glass.

Zulauf also remembered landing on Normandy Beach in 1942.

"I went on the beach from the landing craft," he said. "It was all bombed out by the American and Canadian aircrafts."

The veteran, who drove a tank in the war, eventually worked his way from Normandy into Belgium, Holland and, eventually, to Germany.

These are the stories that he has told his children and grandchildren over and over. And they are the stories that the Jewish War Veterans of Canada are trying to preserve. The organization works to commemorate Canadian Jewish war veterans. Currently, they're getting help from the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and are set up in the Lipa Green Building. Their newest project is a wall of memory, which would hold the names of Canadian Jewish war veterans. While the location of the wall has yet to be decided, the group has already collected about 356 names.

The Toronto district of the Jewish War Veterans has a board of nine people. In 2009, the group's Toronto branch had about 300 members, most of whom were war veterans. Only a handful of members or volunteers were part of a younger generation.

Without this generation, experiences like Zulauf's may never be heard, said Ev Bluestein, the committee's secretary.

"I'm 86. Health-wise, it's very difficult to get active people," he said. "The point is, if we can get the young people, somebody's son, somebody's grandchild… then we'll be able to branch out."

When asked what will happen to the organization if it doesn't get enough younger members and volunteers, Bluestein has a simple answer.

"We will," he said.

For Bluestein, who fought in World War II in an infantry battalion, the organization is about more than just memories. It's about pride.

"We want to give the Jewish population pride that we involve ourselves on a higher scale than any other type of person. We fought well, and we had our losses and we want to be remembered," he said.

Debra Stuart, Zulauf's daughter, also wants the veterans to be remembered. Stuart, whose father is a member of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, has started volunteering for the organization. As an expert in marketing and public relations, she's helping the organization with marketing and putting up a website.

Recently, she has become aware of the possibility of a decline of membership in the organization.

"It would be… attributed to the elderly members becoming ill. They're dying off. I, for one, really want to remember my father's stories," she said. "It's very meaningful to me."

Stuart understands the importance of commemorating veterans.

"They fought for our freedom. We want to make sure that children and grandchildren continue to feel proud of what these people did for their country," she said. "I'm proud of my father."

For more information or to become a volunteer, call 416-635-2883, ext. 5181, or e-mail Ev Bluestein at evblue@sympatico.ca.

TORONTO JEWISH FILM FESTIVAL PRESENTS

BROTHERS

Brothers Dan and Aaron meet in Israel after many years apart, only to discover how different they have become. Dan is a secular Jew living on a kibbutz, while Aaron is an Orthodox lawyer and Torah scholar from the U.S. who has come to Israel to fight a court case. The conflict between the brothers is echoed in the legal battle, which highlights the issue of separation of state and religion in modern Israel. A fascinating argument that will certainly provoke discussion!

Mozart's music mellows out at-risk preemies

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN
ISRAEL21C

Studies have shown that listening to music composed by Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart has a positive effect on the brains of developing babies, but now a new Israeli study has found that Mozart's music also appears to have a positive effect on babies born prematurely.

Israeli researchers found that exposure to Mozart's music causes preemies to expend less energy, which results in faster weight gain and an earlier release home. Conducted at the departments of neonatology and pediatrics at the Tel Aviv Sourasky Medical Center, the study showed that just 30 minutes of Mozart a day can make a world of difference in the development of premature babies.

Published in the medical journal Pediatrics, the study, by Dr. Dror Mandel and his colleagues, was part of the international Newborn Individualized Developmental Care and Assessment Program (NIDCAP), which looks at ways of improving infant welfare in neonatal units.

Environmental conditions such as light levels, tactile elements and diverse sounds may influence the rate at which newborns develop. Research involves seeing if there are optimal conditions in the hospital for a speedy release of prematurely born babies.

In hospital, pre-term babies may be susceptible to infections, but before they can go home, they must gain a certain amount of weight. Mandel and his colleagues have found that exposure to Mozart may speed up weight gain. This protects them not only early in life, but in later life, too, he said.

The researchers exposed 20 babies, with healthy and appropriate weights for their age, to the music of Mozart or no music on two consecutive days for a 30-minute period and measured their metabolic activity.

> 'We think there is something in the organization of the cortex [of the brain] which resonates with the Mozart music'

The study showed that listening to Mozart lowered the amount of energy that the babies expended, which means that they were able to gain weight faster.

While this is an encouraging result for the use of Mozart in neonatal units, it's an early study. "We don't really know what are the long-term effects of this music," Mandel said.

Studies such as this one are intended to scientifically quantify the hypothesis that the environment – and the use of music – can be optimized for rapid release of infants from the hospital. "We don't really know how the sounds they hear or how the tactile stimulations they get from the nurses affect development," Mandel said.

"They all have an effect on the development. NIDCAP is a program that looks at all these elements together. For example, it has been found that a bath and diaper change for the baby should be done at the same time. It is better for them if we cluster interventions."

The Israeli team chose Mozart over other classical composers such as Beethoven due to the "Mozart effect," which has been measured in college students. A study found that those who listened to Mozart before taking an IQ test scored higher. Mozart's music has also been found to positively affect epileptics. When the music of Mozart, Bach, Chopin, Wagner and Bartok were compared, the best effects were measured with Mozart's music, but researchers don't know why.

"We don't know if it's a music effect or a Mozart effect," Mandel said.

"We think there is something in the organization of the cortex [of the brain] which resonates with the Mozart music."

Mandel and his team are now investigating different types of music, including ethnic music, and its effect on infants after birth, compared to exposure to music in the womb.

Our breast cancer tests accurate: JGH

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — The Jewish General Hospital (JGH) says an independent review has confirmed that its system of testing tissue samples for evidence of breast cancer is virtually 100 per cent accurate.

Those findings, announced Dec. 16 by Quebec's Ministry of Health and Social Services, should reassure women who have undergone breast cancer testing at the hospital in the past year, the hospital says.

Concern about the reliability of testing in the province was raised last spring, when a study done at the Université de Montréal found that 15 per cent of breast cancer tests were botched in 25 Quebec laboratories. The tests looked at were those done on the hormone markers in tumours that are used to determine how best to treat the disease.

"These results are a solid piece of evidence that women requiring treatment for breast cancer at the JGH have received – and will continue to receive – appropriate and effective care," said JGH executive director Dr. Hartley Stern. "This is due to the hospital's rigorous adherence to quality control, as well as its ability to satisfy the most stringent international standards in pathology."

"Quality assurance at the JGH is practised on many levels," added Dr. Gerald Batist, chief of oncology and director of the JGH Segal Cancer Centre. "Risk to our patients is significantly reduced because screening is conducted in a two-step process.

"First, the pathology of every breast cancer patient is reviewed by a breast-cancer pathologist. The patient's pathology then undergoes a systematic review by a multidisciplinary tumour board, to maximize the quality of care."

The key to the JGH success rate is the close connection among the different hospital departments, said pathology chief Dr. Alan Spatz. "In order to ensure the safety of our patients and to give them the best possible care, clear and constant interaction between the oncology and pathology departments – including quality management and data management – was and still is instrumental."

Hospital auxiliary to host fitness fundraiser

Compiled by CJN Staff

Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary will host a fitness marathon this spring to raise funds for breast cancer research at the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute.

The second annual Yoga in Motion, which features yoga and Zumba, a dance-inspired cardio workout, will be held at the Liberty Grand Entertainment Complex on April 25.

The marathon is designed for yoga enthusiasts, fitness fans and beginners alike and includes four yoga classes and four Zumba sessions led by some of Toronto's top instructors.

Yoga in Motion will also feature gift bags, prizes, product vendors, healthy-lifestyle information, breast cancer screening and food samples.

Event ambassador Dr. Marla Shapiro, a health journalist and a breast cancer survivor, said: "I'm inspired to champion an event that will benefit breast cancer awareness, research and education. Together, we are in motion for a cure. Please join me and hundreds of others as we take part."

Yoga in Motion participants are asked to raise a minimum $250 each, with fundraising support tools provided through the Yoga in Motion website at www.yogainmotion.ca.

In October 2009, a collaboration between Dr. Bob Casper and his team at the Lunenfeld and Dr. Aaron Wheeler's team at the University of Toronto resulted in an innovative approach for measuring estrogen levels in clinical samples. It could lead to more sensitive diagnostic tests to assess the risk of breast cancer.

In February 2009, Lunenfeld principal investigator, Dr. Jeff Wrana, and his team unveiled new technology that can analyze breast cancer tumours to determine a patient's best treatment option and predict, with more than 80 per cent accuracy, a patient's chance of recovery.

Dr. Marla Shapiro

"Breast cancer devastates more Canadian women than any other cancer," says Ian Taylor, a PhD candidate at the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute and a member of Wrana's research team.

"The advancement in breast cancer research since the mid-1980s has been substantial, and this would not have been possible without generous donor support. Researchers, healthcare professionals, donors and the community each have their part in improving breast health."

Family cookbooks a treasure-trove of memories

By DOROTHY LIPOVENKO
Special to The CJN

In the shade of an old maple tree, Betty Burkholder and a few cousins were swapping ideas for the celebration of their Mennonite family's Canadian bicentennial. Inspired by the little black notebooks filled with their great-grandmothers' recipe jottings, the group gave a new twist to the show and tell of family history: a heritage cookbook.

It's a cookbook that you'll only find in the kitchens of descendents of Fanny Reiff and Christian Reesor, whose trek with their children and kin from Lancaster County, Penn., to Ontario's Markham Township in 1804 gave rise to a presence that numbers 28,000.

Not just a culinary snapshot of the food (and folk remedies) that nurtured generations, the Reesors' cookbook is its own story, as shown by the family's logo, the Conestoga wagon, on each page. (The wagons held their possessions, but the journey from Pennsylvania was made on foot. According to Burkholder, it took six weeks and included a mother who carried a one-year-old child.)

"We were trying to capture for posterity the old recipes... we all had memories and we wanted to get those memories down for the younger generation, or else it would be lost," Burkholder recalls in an interview.

The cookbook crew cast their net far and wide, reaching out via e-mail, newsletter and old-fashioned word-of-mouth to relatives from Australia to Alberta and points in between. As news of the project spread, the Reesor women dug deep into old recipe diaries filled with the handwritten notes kept by grandmothers and great-grandmothers, and that were now in their hands.

What emerged as the final text was a glimpse into the kitchens of old – with recipes calling for "butter the size of an egg" or "a handful of flour" – featuring a range of dishes from soups and salads to desserts and preserves. And each recipe showcases a personal memory of the "source" cook.

Into the mix, for example, went a century-old recipe for Aunt Bertha's "lemon pie with strips," accompanied by an anecdote from a family member who'd known this woman, born in 1867, and eaten a piece of her refreshing pie as a little girl.

The cookbook was a big hit at the family's 2004 bicentennial reunion, selling out its several hundred copies. As shown by the Reesors, heritage cookbooks are attracting increasing interest as a low-cost, fun way to document family history. Numerous sites on the Internet now offer templates to create and print the texts, or will do it for you.

For those who prefer pen and paper, you can buy beautifully illustrated, inexpensive recipe "scrapbooks," whose blank pages are an open invitation to write your own culinary biography.

I received such a scrapbook as a gift last Chanukah from my husband, who noticed that I'd barely come up for air in two days of reading Cooking Jewish: 532 Great Recipes From The Rabinowitz Family, by noted California food writer Judy Bart Kancigor.

Tracing her grandparents' immigration from a Russian shtetl to the shores of America, Kancigor blends wonderful old black-and-white snapshots with family back stories and recipes. It's an irresistible mix of young and old, new and vintage, and its impact is evident by the kinship so many readers feel with the author's whole mishpachah.

Swamped by submissions, Kancigor tested each recipe to determine which would make it into the book. At the same time, the project heated up phone lines from coast to coast, giving her the opportunity to mine memories from elderly relatives and catch up with far-flung family.

Elizabeth Driver, past president of the Culinary Historians of Ontario, suggests that reconnecting with the past drives the appeal of heritage cookbooks.

"In the past, one took these bonds for granted [because] everyone lived so close to each other," she says. "People want the recipes they grew up with. We want the keys to producing loving food in the kitchen using the recipes of people you care about."

And while technology has made it easier to pass on that traditional information, Driver recently received a box of blank recipe cards from a married daughter overseas, who asked that she write down family recipes to bring with her next time she visited.

Report: Iran slows down nuclear program

By YOSSI MELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

NEW YORK — Iran has suspended its uranium enrichment program for two months, Iranian media sources reported on Monday, saying the move was meant as a gesture of goodwill toward western powers.

The report has not been confirmed by any other sources.

Meanwhile, with or without connection to these reports, U.S. government officials have said that there was still a chance of striking a deal with Iran over its nuclear program.

The possible deal, according to the Washington-based newspaper Politico, would be based on the proposal formed late last September and early October in talks in Geneva and Vienna, between Iran and western powers. The agreement may still go through, even though the deadline that U.S. President Barack Obama set for nuclear talks with Iran, the end of 2009, has expired.

The United States is reportedly mulling new sanctions against Tehran, along with Germany and the four permanent members of the United Nations Security Council.

The new sanctions were meant to specifically target the country's Revolutionary Guard, in charge of Iran's nuclear program, as well as Tehran's economy.

At the moment, it remains unclear if all five Security Council member nations are in agreement on whether to intensify sanctions against Iran, as it seems that Russia is inclined to join the western powers on the issue, with China still objecting.

Catherine Ashton

UN nuclear watchdog, the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), reported recently that Iran has significantly slowed down the operation of the centrifuges in its nuclear enrichment facility in Natanz.

It had not been made clear whether the fact that Iran is operating only 60 per cent of the 9,000 centrifuges has to do with a conscious decision, or perhaps is the result of technical difficulties, or even sabotage by western intelligence agencies.

However, the IAEA report also stated that Iran's uranium enrichment levels have remained constant, indicating that Iran is in full control of its nuclear technology.

Many details of the agreement have not yet been made public, but the bits released to the public call for Iran to transfer about 1,200 kilograms of low-enriched uranium – about 75 per cent of its known stock – to Russia. There, it will be enriched to a level of 20 per cent and then transferred to France, where it will be processed into nuclear fuel and returned to Tehran for use in its research reactor, which makes medical isotopes.

Iran has offered a modification to the forming deal, under which it will deliver the uranium in stages, and would receive the enriched material in stages as well. However, the United States has rejected that offer, sticking to the original wording of the deal.

Iran has made mistakes in its relationships with the West and must work with the international community over its human rights record and its nuclear program, the European Union's new head of foreign policy said Monday.

Catherine Ashton is set to steer the EU's diplomacy over the next five years, making her a key commentator on the bloc's future relations.

Iran is "a country which is steeped in history, and I feel that it has made mistakes. If the country wants to be treated as I believe its history, geography and people deserve, it has to work with us," Ashton said during her confirmation hearing in the European Parliament.

Egypt to ban Gaza aid convoys

JTA

JERUSALEM — Egypt said it will ban Gaza-bound aid convoys from travelling across the country.

Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Abul Gheit made the comment Saturday to the government newspaper Al-Ahram, following the departure of the Viva Palestina aid convoy led by British MP George Galloway.

Abul Gheit said members of the convoy committed hostile and criminal acts in Egypt on the way to Gaza.

"Egypt will no longer allow convoys, regardless of their origin or who is organizing them, from crossing its territory," Abul Gheit said.

Galloway was deported last Friday from Egypt and declared a persona non grata.

Some 55 people were injured in clashes last week between convoy activists and police. Seven protesters were arrested.

Peer ousted in Kiwi tourney amid protests

JTA

SYDNEY, Australia — Two more pro-Palestinian protesters were arrested as Israeli tennis star Shahar Peer lost in the semifinals of a tournament in New Zealand.

Peer, 22 and ranked No. 30 in the world, lost last Friday to third-seeded Yanina Wickmayer of Belgium in the ASB Classic in Auckland.

Prior to last Friday's arrests, seven other members of Global Peace and Justice Auckland and Palestine Human Rights Campaign Auckland, including the organizer of the protests, were arrested.

Play had to be suspended on Jan. 6 as officials debated whether to continue Peer's match due to the small but noisy demonstration outside the tennis complex.

The protesters, members of Global Peace and Justice Auckland and Palestine Human Rights Campaign Auckland, used a loud speaker to chant "blood, blood on your hands," "freedom for Palestine," and "go home, Shahar," according to the New Zealand Herald.

One man was arrested by police and charged with disorderly behaviour, local media reported. Similar protests took place during Peer's match at the venue last Tuesday.

"I also want peace in the world," Peer said after the match. "But I don't think this is the place for this protest. I came here to play tennis. I know I'm from Israel, and I'm proud of my country."

Global Peace and Justice, which supports a sports boycott against Israel, staged a similar demonstration against Peer at the same event last year.

The organizer of the protests, John Minto, who called for Peer to withdraw from the tournament and for a sports boycott against Israel, told local media: "There will be bigger and bigger protests here in Auckland protesting against her presence in representing Israel's policies."

Meanwhile, Peer will be allowed to play in this year's Women's Tennis Association tournament in Dubai, starting Feb. 15, following a furor last year after she was denied a visa because of "security concerns" following Israel's military operation in Gaza.

The United Arab Emirate's Ministry of Interior has written to the WTA Tour confirming she will be granted a visa, London's Telegraph reported.

The UAE does not have diplomatic relations with Israel.

Ancient Hebrew inscription could push back date of Bible

Yaen Vered, the representative in Canada of the Israel Antiquities Authority (IAA), an independent agency that regulates excavations and promotes research, was more cautious in evaluating the shard's significance.

"It was found in the Elah Valley and it is of substance, there is no question. As far as we know, it is of the time of the kings. That is as far as we know. More than that requires more research and more finds," Vered said.

"It's too early for jumping to conclusions. We're talking about one piece and we don't have another thing to put against it or for it. We don't have another piece to verify it."

The shard was discovered during excavations under Prof. Yosef Garfinkel of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. The excavation in the Elah Valley, where the Bible says David fought Goliath, was conducted by Hebrew U under licence from the IAA.

Alex Gropper, president of the Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies at the University of Toronto and a CJN columnist, agreed the inscription could ultimately prove to be significant, but said it's too early to tell.

"The information is certainly interesting, but the verdict is not in. It's an exciting find, but it will take time to make the case," said Gropper, who has been involved in archeological digs in Israel for 40 years.

Galil said the sophistication and content of the Khirbet Qeiyafa inscription, written as poetry by local scribes, suggest that other "proficient writers" in Jerusalem at that time could well have composed biblical books.

The text calls on the people of Israel to help the poor, widows and orphans, as do verses in the Torah. The inscription, he said, is similar to the content found in Isaiah 1:17, Psalms 72:3 and Exodus 23:3.

"The text is a social statement, relating to slaves, widows and orphans. It uses verbs that were characteristic of Hebrew, such as 'asah' (did) and 'avad' (worked), which were rarely used in other regional languages. Particular words that appear in the text such as 'almanah' (widow) are specific to Hebrew and are written differently in other local languages."

Neighbouring peoples, such as the Assyrians and the Mari, never raised social issues such as helping disadvantaged people, but rather focused on placating their gods, he said.

Galil speculated that the text, written left to right unlike today's Hebrew, may have been penned by a scribe copying from a teacher or listening to dictation. There are two mistakes in the five-line inscription that suggest "it's a kind of exercise. He's listening to a teacher or copying a text."

The inscription reads:

1. You shall not do [it], but worship the [Lord].
2. Judge the sla[ve] and the wid[ow]/ Judge the orph[an]
3. [and] the stranger. [Pl]ead for the infant/plead for the po[or and]
4. the widow. Rehabilitate [the poor] at the hands of the king.
5. Protect the po[or and] the slave/ [supp]ort the stranger.

Galil said that unlike the mainstream view of biblical scholars, who date the Bible relatively late, the inscription clearly shows that Davidic-era scribes "knew how to write sophisticated verse in an early period. There is no need to claim the Bible came later.

"This changes the view of when the Torah was written," he said.

Prehistoric building uncovered near Tel Aviv

JTA

JERUSALEM — The remains of a prehistoric building, the earliest ever found in the Tel Aviv region, have been discovered in Ramat Aviv.

The building is estimated to be between 7,800 and 8,400 years old, the Israel Antiquities Authority (IAA) said Monday.

The archeological excavation was carried out recently in the tony Tel Aviv neighbourhood prior to the construction of an apartment building.

"This discovery is both important and surprising to researchers of the period," said archeologist Ayelet Dayan, director of the excavation on behalf of the IAA, who said it was the first time that archeologists had encountered evidence of a permanent habitation that existed in the Tel Aviv region about 8,000 years ago.

The site is located on the northern bank of the Yarkon River, not far from the confluence with Nahal Ayalon.

"We can assume that this fact influenced the ancient settlers in choosing a place to live," Dayan said. "The fertile alluvium soil along the fringes of the streams was considered a preferred location for a settlement in ancient periods."

Also uncovered in the excavation were a fragment of a base of a basalt bowl and animal remains – hippopotamus bones, and teeth that probably belonged to a sheep or goat.

Mexican businessman killed in crash

JTA

JERUSALEM — A Mexican businessman was killed in a helicopter crash near Mexico City.

Jewish businessman Moises Saba Masri died early Monday morning when one of the rotors of the helicopter he was riding in struck a building due to heavy fog, according to reports. At least four other people, including two members of Masri's family and the pilot, were killed in the crash.

Moises Saba Masri

Masri owned real estate and medical companies, and had extensive holdings in Mexican telecom company Unefon and broadcaster TV Azteca. He also owned two hotels in Acapulco.

Israel's Zaka rescue organization was reportedly preparing to send a delegation to Mexico Monday afternoon to assist in identifying the dead.

Masri, one of the most influential businessmen in Mexico, was involved in businesses ranging from pharmaceuticals to telecom.

Israel Briefs

Israel strikes Gaza

Israeli warplanes struck four targets in Gaza last Thursday in response to a rocket that landed near Ashkelon. The Israel Defence Forces said the targets included several smuggling tunnels in southern Gaza, as well as a weapons manufacturing facility. The Thursday-night raid followed the firing of a Katyusha rocket at the southern Israeli city of Ashkelon that caused no casualties. Palestinians said one person was killed and two wounded in the Israeli strikes. The rocket attack near Ashkelon followed the launching of at least 10 mortar shells at southern Israel, also on Thursday. The earlier attack also caused no damage or injuries. Six shells landed in the northwestern Negev, three near the Kerem Shalom crossing and one landed in Gaza. The Popular Resistance Committees claimed responsibility, reportedly saying it was in revenge for the killing of two of its members Jan. 5 as they prepared to fire rockets from Gaza.

Missile defence passes tests

An Israeli defence system designed to shoot down rockets and mortars shot at Israel from Gaza was successful in field trials. The Iron Dome system intercepted several rockets during tests last week, the Israel Defence Forces said Jan. 6. Several missiles resembling Qassam and Katyusha rockets were shot simultaneously. The system, designed by the state-owned Rafael Advanced Defence Systems, is expected to be deployed near the Gaza border later this year.

Israel to compensate UN

Israel reportedly has agreed to pay $10 million (US) in compensation for damaging United Nations buildings in Gaza. Israel hit several UN properties, including schools, storehouses and vehicles, during its military offensive in Gaza last winter. Israel says the properties weren't targeted, but that Hamas terrorists were targeting Israel from inside or near the buildings. Israel says the compensation is for collateral damage. It's the first compensation Israel will pay for damage caused in Gaza during the offensive, the BBC reported. The compensation deal comes after several months of talks. Israel still must ink a final agreement, Bloomberg reported, but Defence Minister Ehud Barak reportedly told UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon of the decision.

Military officials cancel Britain trip

A delegation of Israeli military officers cancelled a visit to Britain two weeks ago out of fear they would be arrested on war crimes charges. The cancellation comes a month after Israeli opposition leader Tzipi Livni cancelled a visit to Britain after learning a London court had approved a warrant for her arrest on war crimes charges. The delegation of senior Israel Defence Forces officers had been invited by the British army. Their visit was cancelled after British authorities said they couldn't assure Israeli Foreign Ministry officials that the delegation wouldn't be arrested. The warrants seek to charge Israeli officials with war crimes in connection with Israel's war in Gaza last winter. In December, Hamas said that it was working with lawyers in Britain and other European countries to pursue war crimes cases against Israel. Britain has assured Israel it will try to implement measures to solve the issue.

Iraq to sue Israel

Iraq is planning to sue Israel for bombing its nuclear reactor at Osirak nearly three decades ago. Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki has instructed his foreign ministry to find out from the United Nations whether it can receive compensation from Israel. Israel's air force bombed the reactor, which had not yet gone online, in 1981. A UN resolution passed at the time condemned Israel's attack and determined Iraq had a right to demand compensation, the Jerusalem Post reported. Baghdad has demanded that the United Nations set up a committee to assess the damage caused by Israel's attack so it can calculate appropriate compensation.

As zero hour nears, differences emerge on sanctions

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

WASHINGTON — As long as the Iran conversation was broad and dealt only with "sanctions," the U.S. Congress, the White House and the American pro-Israel community seemed to be on the same page.

But now that Iran has rejected just about every bouquet sent its way and the talk has turned to the details, longstanding differences over how best to go forward are taking centre stage.

With the backing of many Jewish groups, Congress appears to be pressing ahead with a package that targets Iran's energy sector.

While the White House appears to support new congressional sanctions, it appears to favour more narrow measures targeting the Iranian leadership and the Iranian Revolutionary Guards Corps, considered especially vulnerable because of the recent anti-government turmoil.

In part the debate is over which approach would do more to help opposition forces in Iran. But also playing a role is the Obama administration's continuing emphasis on securing international backing for tougher measures against Tehran, the idea being that sweeping U.S. sanctions aimed at the Iranian energy sector could turn off several key nations.

Additionally, the Obama administration hasn't counted out the prospect of engagement with Iran, although the Mahmoud Ahmadinejad government has put to rest any notion that it will entertain the West's offer to enrich Iran's uranium to medical research levels in exchange for transparency about the Islamic Republic's suspected nuclear weapons program.

"Our goal is to pressure the Iranian government, particularly the Revolutionary Guard elements, without contributing to the suffering" of Iranians, "who deserve better than what they currently are receiving," U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton said in a news conference last week.

Opponents of the congressional sanctions, which target just about any investment anywhere in the world in Iran's energy sector, say they would be inhumane and rally support for the regime.

"Having opposed the adoption of crippling sanctions all along, Americans for Peace Now is glad to see further affirmation from the White House that it does not seek such crippling sanctions," said Ori Nir, a spokesperson for Peace Now, the only major Jewish group opposing the congressional package.

In defence of the proposed legislation, one insider from a centrist pro-Israel group recounted a much-repeated scenario: the cab driver who runs out of gas in the middle of a traffic-clogged street, gets out of the car, and raises his fist and curses – not the West as he might have just a year or so ago, but Ahmadinejad and the rest of Iran's leaders.

"In tyrannies, the fiction that keeps people under control is the trust they have in government to take care of them and the fear they have of confronting the government," the insider said. "In Iran, the trust is gone, and the fear is still there, but going."

Concerns that the congressional package will lead to human misery are overstated, its backers say. The bills include provisions for presidential waivers and are meant first as leverage.

Similar sanctions packages passed by Congress in the 1990s also were never implemented by presidents Bill Clinton and George W. Bush, yet they had an almost immediate effect because of the threat of being implemented. Major western traders pulled out of Iran, which is partly why the country's refinement capabilities are in disarray. Iran, a major oil exporter, still must import up to 40 per cent of its refined petroleum.

The principals in shaping the previous sanctions – in Congress, the Clinton administration and the American Israel Public Affairs Committee – now openly admit that they were playing a coordinated "good cop-bad cop" game: Republicans who backed the sanctions would quietly shape their criticisms of the Clinton administration in consultation with administration officials. Clinton officials then would cite that "pressure" in getting European nations to join in efforts to isolate Iran.

It's not clear now whether a similar dynamic is at work between the White House and Congress. Some insiders say it is. Others say the Obama administration is genuinely wary of punishing sanctions and is unhappy with the pressure from Congress and the pro-Israel community.

The U.S. House of Representatives passed its sanctions package in late December, and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid has pledged to attend to the Senate version as soon as the chamber reconvenes Jan. 19.

Senator John Kerry, chair of the Senate's foreign relations committee, has said he is willing to consider the White House's objections, particularly to a proposed blacklist of companies that deal with Iran and to sanctions that target third-party entities – companies and nations that deal with Iran.

Meanwhile, the Obama administration is moving ahead with the following actions:

- Pressing other major powers to back a proposed UN Security Council resolution that would expand existing sanctions on travel and business dealings to 3,000 individuals associated with the Revolutionary Guards;
- Intensify enforcement of existing U.S. sanctions on doing business with Iran;
- Intensify efforts to uncover and fine companies that cover up their financial dealings with Iran.

Holocaust survivor dies, leaving 2,500 descendants

JTA

NEW YORK — A 94-year-old Holocaust survivor died, leaving behind at least 2,500 descendants.

Yitta Schwartz of Kiryas Joel in New York was buried Jan. 4. She had five generations of descendants.

Schwartz survived Bergen Belsen, leaving the concentration camp with her family intact when World War II ended in 1945. Schwartz, her husband and six children moved to Belgium before settling in the Williamsburg section of Brooklyn, the Times Herald-Record reported.

The couple had 11 more children following the war. Her husband died 33 years ago.

Schwartz, who reportedly was reluctant to talk about the Holocaust, had about 170 grandchildren and knew all their names.

Should Israel be a model for U.S. airport security?

By GIL SHEFLER
JTA

NEW YORK — As U.S. officials try to figure out how to improve airport security in the aftermath of the failed Christmas Day bombing attempt of a Northwest Airlines flight to Detroit, many North Americans are looking to Israel as a model.

The New York Times opened a forum for readers to discuss the pros and cons of Israeli airport security. The Toronto Star interviewed an Israeli airport security expert who said the best way to nab a terrorist is to "look them in the eye."

David Harris, executive director of the American Jewish Committee, wrote a piece for the Huffington Post about the lessons U.S. airport security officials can learn from their counterparts in Israel.

"From the perspective of security, one is in a class by itself – Israel's Ben-Gurion Airport," Harris wrote. "In the wake of the thwarted terrorist attempt on Northwest Flight 253, it's time to revisit the Israeli model, as other countries ask what more can be done to prevent such near-catastrophes."

El Al, Israel's national airline, has been the target of more attacks and specific threats than any other airline in the world. After a number of shootings and hijackings by terrorists during the late 1960s and early 1970s, the government-owned company introduced a set of stringent security measures aimed at thwarting future terrorist attacks.

The enhanced security extended to Ben-Gurion International Airport, which also had been the site of terrorist attacks. Security

The Israeli Airport Authority is in the midst of a trial period for a new security system at Ben-Gurion Airport that relies upon a biometric security check. Passports are scanned. A photograph and fingerprint of the traveller are also taken. Travellers are issued a Unipass card. Travellers respond to questions on a computer screen while the Unipass is also scanned under the watchful eye of security officials.

Passenger profiling has been a major component of the security success. Security officials question passengers before sending their luggage and screen them based on their answers and backgrounds. Passengers considered a potential risk are taken aside for further questioning and thoroughly searched.

The Israeli approach has fuelled the debate about whether it is necessary for U.S. airports to introduce new security checkpoints and sophisticated machinery, including full-body scanners. While U.S. airport security relies primarily on technology, the Israeli system relies primarily on human intelligence and profiling.

Passenger profiling by Israeli airport security has been criticized heavily over the years. Many Arab passengers, including Arab Israelis, have complained of being forced to undergo excessive and demeaning security checks. Israeli civil rights groups and Israeli-Arab lawmakers have petitioned Israel's Supreme Court asking that it ban ethnicity-based profiling as discriminatory.

The failed Northwest Airlines bombing attempt spurred U.S. officials to institute new rules mandating special searches for passengers from 14 nations, raising the ire of U.S. civil liberties groups.

Jennifer Laszlo Mizrahi, founder and head of The Israel Project, a pro-Israel advocacy group, says profiling is not discriminatory. On the contrary, she says, in Israel it has benefited both Jews and Arabs.

Laszlo Mizrahi draws a parallel with the West Bank security fence, which she credits with drastically reducing terrorist attacks in Israel.

"The security fence has also been criticized but has saved lives on both sides, just like the airport measures have saved lives on both sides," she told JTA. "There are plenty of Arab citizens that are also being protected by these security measures. They may be inconvenient, but if they save lives, the end result is worth it."

Greek shul damaged in arson attack

JTA

ATHENS — The only synagogue on the Greek island of Crete sustained significant water and smoke damage in an arson attack.

Some 30 antique Turkish carpets also were damaged when the Etz Hayyim synagogue in the city of Hania was set ablaze night of Jan. 5 by unknown attackers. The synagogue's Torah scrolls weren't damaged.

The arsonists reportedly climbed over the synagogue's iron gate and made an improvised firebomb using stuffing from a couch in the shul's mikvah to ignite a canister filled with flammable liquid, then placed the firebomb under the wooden staircase leading to the women's section.

The upper floor of the women's section serves as the office of the director, as well as a library and reading room. Among its volumes are valuable books in various languages on Ottoman, Byzantine and Jewish art and architecture.

An Albanian immigrant who lives near the synagogue saw the smoke and called police and firefighters.

There is little security at the synagogue, according to reports. Situated in the heart of the Jewish quarter, the synagogue dates back to the late 15th century.

Also in the attack, a bar of soap was thrown against the outer wall of the synagogue to illustrate the common Greek anti-Semitic expression, "I'll make you into a bar of soap."

Torch bearer 'spreads the pride with the flame'

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

For four minutes on an icy Tuesday morning, Tova Silverman turned into a celebrity.

Dressed in a white uniform and clutching an official Olympic torch in Blue Mountain, Ont., on Dec. 29, the 21-year-old student met her fans.

"The crowds started growing and growing and growing. I couldn't believe it. It was 8:45 a.m… Tons of parents, kids and grandkids were lining the streets. It was a piece of highway that wasn't important until that morning," said Silverman, who was one of some 6,000 people who will or have represented Coca-Cola in the Olympic Torch Relay.

Silverman spent months preparing for her turn as torch bearer. Maybe even years.

As a child, she would turn her toys into a make-shift torch and carry it around the house, from the top of the stairs to the mantelpiece, where she participated in her own Olympic medal ceremony.

"Growing up, the TV was on the whole time [during Olympic games]. No matter what time zone we were in, we were always watching the Olympics," said Silverman, an Ottawa native who is currently majoring in world religions at McGill University.

"[It's] just an exciting time that brings people together."

Some of Silverman's favourite Olympic sports to watch include luge and ski jumping. But, for the torch bearer, the Olympics are about more than just athletics.

"I think it's a great way for people to join together in peace," she said.

When Silverman found out that the Winter Olympics would be held in Vancouver this winter, she wanted to be involved. As a student, she couldn't afford to take the month off that was required for Olympic volunteers. Last summer, she heard about a torch bearer contest run through Coke's website.

"I got wind of a contest from a friend," she said. "I entered... in the middle of the summer and have been thinking about it ever since."

Silverman had to answer a skill-testing question and write a short essay on being environmentally friendly. She was working as a unit head at Camp Ramah in August when she heard from the contest organizers.

"Lo and behold, I got an e-mail that I had won a spot," she said. "I screamed a lot. I got yelled at in the camp office for being too loud."

Silverman isn't just an Olympic fan. She enjoys jogging and running, and is involved in her Jewish community in Ottawa.

"It's about giving back. It's a place where I grew up in… It's a place that really helped shape who I am," said Silverman, who worked with United Synagogue Youth and Hillel at McGill.

When preparing for the torch relay, Silverman began absorbing as many facts as she could.

"I knew every fact, I knew where the torch was going, what its roots were, how it came from Greece, everything about the torch uniform," she said. "It became the thing that people knew about me. I became almost a hub of information."

Tova Silverman, 21, was one of some dozen torch bearers in Blue Mountain, Ont., on Dec. 29.

About a month ago, Silverman received her torch bearer uniform in the mail. It was white, with a splash of blue and green on the arm that represented the Sea to Sky Corridor between Vancouver and Whistler during the winter.

But perhaps the most striking part were the red mittens.

"They are supposed to represent the mittens that every child wears when they're… enjoying Canadian winter," she said.

On the morning of Dec. 29, she pulled on the white suit and pants, put on her white toque and slipped on the mittens.

"I couldn't believe the day was actually here," she said. "It was cloudy and the snow was blowing a little bit, and it was really, really cold. But that didn't seem to matter. I didn't feel cold when I was out there."

The torch was white, about three feet tall and 3-1/2 pounds. It was heavier than she thought it would be.

"They lit a wick… and then lit my torch and suddenly this whole torch in front of me blew up," she said.

When thinking back on her four minutes of fame, Silverman remembers the crowd, with their Canadian flags and cowbells.

"Everyone had a camera out. Everyone was cheering. You could feel the excitement in the air," she said. "Tons of kids asked to touch [the torch]… I just felt this connection with them immediately. It wasn't about me. It was about spreading the pride that comes with the flame."

For Silverman, the torch relay was about connecting with her country.

"When the torch was lit, it was inspiring. It was this flame that had been passed around the entire country, originating in Greece. It was suddenly there in front of me. I felt like I was part of something. Part of a world event," she said.

"I was the only person in the world that was carrying the torch at the moment. When I passed it on, I saw another person's face light up. It was just this continuation."

Interest in Nathanson's play spiked after G-G award nomination

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

Michael Nathanson, the artistic director and general manager of the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre, was surprised to learn he was nominated for a 2009 Governor General's Award for writing the play Talk.

The provocative, emotionally honest play about the collapse of a friendship between a Jewish man and his non-Jewish friend in the aftermath of 9/11, because of their opposing viewpoints about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, premièred in Winnipeg in 2007.

As a result of the award nomination, Nathanson, 43, said interest in the play has soared. "There are now 10 theatres looking at producing the play. The play will be put on by the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company in Toronto [in March]...That is the upside of the nomination. It confers a legitimacy on the play that it wouldn't have otherwise."

Nathanson's engaging 80-minute play about two buddies, Josh and Gordon, whose friendship goes awry when the word "Palestine" is mentioned, is based on the playwright's own personal experience.

Michael Nathanson

Nathanson was in New York the day two planes plowed into the World Trade Center. He and his bride, Rebecca Brask, had been married the month before in Manitoba and wanted to tie the knot again stateside to jump-start her quest for immigration papers that would allow her to live in the United States. Convinced there were more deadly attacks to come, the pair fled New York within a week.

In the aftermath of the terrorist attacks, Nathanson received an e-mail from one of his pals in Italy loaded with anti-American and anti-Israel diatribes.

"I was dumfounded, given that he knew I was Jewish and what I had just lived through," Nathanson recalled. "When I questioned him, he went insane on me, accusing me of not letting him express his opinion and of being a fascist."

A confused Nathanson began to sort out his own feelings about the event by penning a dialogue about the situation. The thought-provoking and, at times, humorous debate in Talk has been fictionalized, although Nathanson said parts of the script resemble some of his actual conversations.

"Although the play deals with the Middle East conflict, its main focus has to be about the relationship between the guys and how it falls apart. If we don't feel their loss as friends, then the play doesn't resonate as well as it should," Nathanson said.

"It never occurred to me that I would be nominated for the [Governor General's Literary Award]. I didn't know that Playwrights Canada Press put it in for consideration. When my wife phoned to tell me Talk was a GG finalist, I didn't quite believe it... It was very surreal."

Nathanson added that he initially "pitched the play" to every Jewish theatre in North America, noting that it was a marketing challenge. He recalled that one rejection letter stated, "As soon as the conflict in the Middle East is settled, we'll be happy to present this show to our subscribers because it will be less controversial then."

Meanwhile, his relationship with his friend in Italy soured. "We had communication for a while and seemingly worked through our differences. However, when the Winnipeg Free Press published an article about Talk... he read about it online... I received an e-mail from him that was very angry... I have not heard from him since."

Currently, Nathanson is writing a comedy, One of Ours, which is set for a first reading in May 2010 with Winnipeg Jewish Theatre producing the world première in April 2011.

"The play has four characters and is set at West Hawk Lake. It's about a Winnipeg Jewish family. There are two brothers, a wife and one of the brothers brings home an unexpected guest. It deals with the issues of family businesses and generational divides."

Nathanson began his career acting on television at age 13. His plays have been staged in New York, Dallas, and at festivals across Canada.

In Winnipeg, Michael has written for Theatre Projects Manitoba, CBC Radio and the University of Winnipeg. He has written two animated, 50-episode Internet-based series for Little Fox, Korea.

Talk will run in Toronto at the Jane Mallett Theatre from March 3 to 20. For tickets, call 416-366-7723.

Teen jazz sensation scats her way to the top

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

When Nikki Yanofsky was a kid, she used to bang on chairs to make music. Now she sings to thousands of people worldwide

Yanofsky, 15, who sings mostly jazz and some pop, made her musical debut at the 2006 Montreal International Jazz Festival.

Since then, the Montreal native has recorded a track for High School Musical 2, and was the youngest singer to record a song for an Ella Fitzgerald tribute album on Verve Records. She has also recently begun touring internationally.

"I was always listening to music since I was two years old," she said. "I'd always be attracted to anything that resembles music, whether banging on chairs or singing songs."

Yanofsky began singing jazz after hearing Ella Fitzgerald sing. It wasn't long until she was hooked.

"Ella kind of ushered me into jazz music. It became my first love," she said. "[Jazz] is so much fun to sing. I owe a lot to it."

To Yanofsky, singing jazz is a challenge. And the teen likes challenges.

"I kind of like to bite off a little more than I could chew. That's just in general. I enjoy things that make me work a little harder. I guess jazz kind of had that appeal," she said, adding that she also sings pop and hip hop.

When singing, Yanofsky will often lapse into scatting. One of her favourite moments onstage is performing Airmail Special, a scat song by Ella Fitzgerald.

"When I sing it, the audience, I don't know how they know, but they know it's more challenging and they start applauding midway. It makes it so worth it," she said.

"Scatting originated with jazz. It's so cool, your voice gets to take a solo… This year and last year, I'm making up my own scats on the spot [while performing]. It gives me freedom to do everything in [my] head. They say, 'It's jazz, anything goes.' It's OK if you make a mistake."

But Yanofsky is a perfectionist. She'll spend several hours singing and practising every day, even if she's on vacation.

This preparation helps her feel comfortable on stage. While Yanofsky started performing at a young age, she's never had a problem with nerves.

"I get a rush of excitement, but I never get nervous. It's never like nervous, 'I'm scared,' it's nervous excited," she said.

"The trick to not being nervous is being really prepared, that's what I try to do. The best part is when you hear the audience really appreciate what you put your heart and soul into."

Whether in Montreal or Japan, it isn't difficult for the singer to connect with her audiences.

"If you don't [connect], you have to get them to connect with you," she said. "The audience feels your energy and gives it back to you."

Yanofsky will be performing in Mississauga on Jan. 15 and then in Saskatoon the next day.

"Toronto's one of my favourite cities. It's one of the most Canadian New Yorks," she said.

Apart from playing in New York and other American cities this summer, she toured Japan, and got to take her best friend along.

"It was so much fun. The days that we wouldn't be doing shows, we would go… shopping together. We have the funniest pictures," she said, adding that the country was a different cultural experience.

"The crowd is so different… They're a lot more reserved, but they're so respectful. They don't talk at all [at concerts]," she said.

Yanofsky has recently started writing her own music. She has an album called New to Me, with several original songs on it, coming out in the spring.

While writing music is new for the teen, she has been writing poetry since she was 10 years old.

"It's a way of expressing yourself. I'm very expressive. That's why I love music so much," she said.

Yanofsky will be performing in Missisauga on Jan. 15 at the Living Arts Centre and in Saskatoon on Jan. 16 at TCU Place. For more information or to order tickets, visit www.nikkionline.ca.

Brothers examines secular-religious tensions in Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The palpable tensions between ultra-religious and secular Jews in Israel is the subject of Igaal Niddam's thoughtful and important Hebrew-language Swiss film, Brothers.

Scheduled to be presented by the Toronto Jewish Film Festival's Chai Tea + A Movie series on Sunday, Jan. 17 at 5 p.m. at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Centre, this nearly two-hour movie is set in Jerusalem and on a kibbutz.

The theme is skillfully fleshed out by Niddam. Two estranged brothers, originally from Buenos Aires, are reunited in Israel after a long, painful absence. They were separated in the 1970s, when Argentina was convulsed by a period of coups and political violence.

Dan, the older brother, was a left-wing revolutionary in Argentina. He immigrated to Israel with the police hot on his heels. Aaron, who was sent to an Orthodox yeshiva in Brooklyn by his single mother, settled in the United States.

Now, three decades later, the pair meet, but they are worlds apart in terms of their views, values and lifestyles. Dan (Micha Celektar), a kibbutznik, is thoroughly secular. Aaron (Baruch Brener), a Talmud scholar and lawyer, is profoundly religious. He looks and talks like a haredi.

From the moment Aaron arrives at the kibbutz after being picked up at the airport by Dan and his wife, the brothers seem destined to clash. Much to Dan's annoyance, Aaron declines to shake hands with his wife, or share their meals. But compared to the looming courtroom confrontation that will severely dent their already frayed relationship, these are really minor irritants.

Unbeknownst to Dan, Aaron has come to Israel to represent an Orthodox yeshiva in a contentious Supreme Court test case. The head of the yeshiva, a Holocaust survivor, has directed his students to ignore induction orders from Israel's armed forces. Not recognizing the authority of the state, they burn their draft papers, setting the stage for a legal challenge from the government.

Some of the most gripping scenes unfold in the court as Aaron, a revered figure in the eyes of the rebellious rabbinical students, locks horns with the government's lawyer, a staunch secularist named Shelly (Orna Pitussi). Essentially, they engage in a dialogue of the deaf.

Presenting his arguments on behalf of the yeshiva, Aaron delves into religious texts to prove that the students are not draft dodgers and have a right to evade army service.

In defence of this position, Aaron summons a Muslim kadi, who claims that they speak "the same language" in terms of their religious fervour. During his brief appearance in the court, the kadi hints that he does not accept Israel's existence. Is Niddam suggesting that the kadi and Aaron are both anti-Israel? Let the viewer decide.

In her rebuttal, Shelly contends that mandatory call-ups are necessary, because Israel is still fighting for its sheer survival.

The bitter court case, with its reams of newspaper headlines, further embitters Dan's relations with Aaron. "You represent everything I despise," Dan declares. Dan opposes religious coercion and compares Jews like Aaron to a "cancer" gnawing away at Israel's foundations. Aaron accuses Dan of being a self-hating Jew and contends that religion and state are inseparable.

Their philosophical disagreement, a source of acrimony in modern Israel, is encapsulated in a few lines of dialogue in which Israel is perceived by Dan as the Jewish homeland and by Aaron as the Holy Land. Niddam, an able director, mines these tensions to create an upstanding film.

Gripping scenes unfold in the courtroom in Brothers.

In the final scenes, Brothers makes an unexpected U-turn, with Aaron realizing that secular Jews are worthy of respect and that a corruption scandal has compromised the integrity of the yeshiva. As a result, Aaron angers and alienates his admirers at the yeshiva, particularly the violence-prone, headstrong son of its director.

Still more surprising, Aaron, a bachelor, finds himself inexorably drawn to and "bewitched" by Shelly, a single mom who's not only smart but attractive. But it's not a match that can realistically be consummated.

Brothers, propelled along by a lucid script and stellar performances from its lead actors, deals frankly and intelligently with the theme that Niddam fleshes out so deftly, the gap between civil and religious law in Israel. It's an important issue and Niddam does justice to it.

THERAC 25*: Therac 25 is a play about two young people who meet and embark on a relationship in the cancer ward of Princess Margaret Hospital in Toronto. Playwright Adam Pettle, above, said writing the script was a survival mechanism to preoccupy himself during his radiation therapy in 1995. The characters Alan and Moira each suffer from a different form of cancer. Companionship and humour helps them struggle against isolation and fear, even while their personal boundaries and Moira's worsening condition strain their bond. Directed by Hume Baugh. Chagall Painting Acquired: The London Jewish Museum of Art secretly purchased a rare Marc Chagall painting at a Paris auction last fall, paying only about $43,000 – a fraction of its estimated $1.6-million value – for the work, the Times of London reported.

Chagall painted Apocalypse in Lilac, Capriccio in 1945, using a crucifixion to represent the persecution of Jews during the Holocaust. The small gallery purchased the work in secret to prevent larger museums from driving up the price and to avoid any potential difficulties in exporting the work out of the country.

The gouache painting reportedly remained in Chagall's personal collection until his death. His son sold it to a private collector in France in 1985. According to a report in JTA, the gallery planned to put the painting on display last week.

Toronto psychologist writes about growing up in the '60s

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

When she was 12 years old, Cathy McClure looked at herself in the mirror and was disappointed with her straight, curveless figure. Her mother told her not to worry, insisting that the early teenage years were an awkward stage and she would soon grow into herself.

Her mother couldn't be more prophetic. In After the Falls (Knopf Canada), Toronto psychologist Catherine Gildiner's memoir, we see Cathy grow from a rebellious, angry teenage girl who smoked at nine and drove a car in Grade 7, to a strong-willed young woman who was accepted at Oxford University.

Catherine Gildiner

At the same time, Gildiner describes, in wonderful colour, what it was like to grow up in the turbulent decade of the 1960s.

After the Falls is a sequel to her first memoir, the award-winning Too Close to the Falls, which received great acclaim when it was published in 1999. That book ended when Cathy turned 13. This one starts from there, with her family (herself and her parents) moving from Lewiston, N.Y., to Buffalo after her expulsion from school.

There is no reason to have read Too Close to the Falls to enjoy the sequel – I haven't yet, though after reading this it's certainly on my reading list – although there are some references to events that happened in the earlier book.

The big question, of course, is: why read the memoirs of someone who's not a celebrity or someone I've never heard of?

After the Falls is quite simply a great read. Gildiner takes you into her teenage life with ease. A practising clinical psychologist, she is a gifted writer. In addition to her earlier memoir, she also penned Seduction, a bestselling thriller that dealt with the world of academic intrigue.

After the Falls takes place during the 1960s, a decade that's making a resurgence in popular culture, with the likes of the TV show Mad Men and the current movie A Single Man.

New to Buffalo, Cathy has a hard time fitting in, as any new kid would, especially at that age. She bought the right clothes, "social camouflage," and tried hard to blend in. Seeing her despondence, her parents decided to host a "coming out" party for her, and it was such a success that she became part of the "in-crowd." Cathy makes her way up the pecking order, so by the time she was in Grade 12, in 1963, she was at the summit.

This despite not making the cheerleading team because of her severe acne.

Playing in the background of Cathy's coming of age are major historical and cultural events, including John F. Kennedy's assassination, the Beatles' Ed Sullivan Show appearance, and the beatnik, hippie and the civil rights movements.

Cathy, then a Catholic (Gildiner married a Jewish man after the events of this book and joined a Reconstructionist synagogue in Toronto), was an early champion of civil rights, even as a young teenager. While watching the Eichmann trial on TV in the summer of 1961 , she realized how important it is to follow one's own conscience. The hard part, as she says, is to know when the law was wrong and your conscience right.

She puts this faith to the test when she starts a campaign against black lawn jockeys. It was popular at the time for people to have these small statues of black men in jockey outfits holding lanterns on their front lawns.

Cathy was reviled by this display of racism. At her Jewish friend's house one day, she expressed concern to his mother about the lawn jockey on their front lawn. What if someone had a statue in their front yard of "a man from Auschwitz with a yellow star?" she asks.

She gets the idea of forming the Black Lawn Jockey Civil Rights Movement, and, with her friend Fran, she goes out one night to paint the statues white. This act of conscience would be her first run-in with the law. Later on, in college, she would get a visit from the FBI for an unrelated matter.

Throughout these years, Cathy is horrified by the acts of double standards and veiled hypocrisy she keeps witnessing. At Ohio University, she is disgusted by what she calls "institutionalized racism," when she is refused entry to a sorority because she was seen in the company of blacks and "New York types" (Jews).

She decided then that she wasn't going to try to fit in anymore. She felt isolated from the mainstream, but lucky for her, the hippie movement was in its infancy, and at a Buffalo Springfield concert, she realized that within this culture she could get away with being herself.

"I realized at that moment that I no longer needed social camouflage. I might actually get away with being myself."

There are some nasty incidents in this book (including witnessing the gang rape of a teenage girl in her friend's parents' basement by about eight boys, and her father's slow and losing battle with a brain tumour), all of which shape Cathy's moral outlook.

In the end, the fact that Cathy is not a celebrity is what makes this memoir interesting. She is just a normal teenage girl with image issues, parent issues and friendship issues, who all of us can relate to.

The 1960s setting is a perfect backdrop to Gildiner's memoir. As we move from the conservative early '60s to the more radical late '60s, Cathy, as her mother prophesied, does grow into herself and realizes who she is and what she wants to be.

Well-rounded portrait of Richler based on fresh material

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

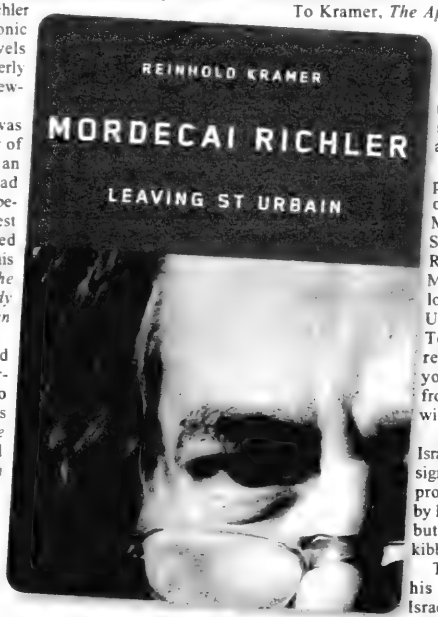
Mordecai Richler was, as his biographer Reinhold Kramer correctly puts it, "one of the greatest writers this country has produced" and "the first 'ethnic' writer to be ready widely in Canada."

Kramer, a Brandon University English professor, makes these reasonable claims in Mordecai Richler: Leaving St. Urbain, a well-rounded portrait based on fresh material, including interviews with relatives and friends.

McGill-Queen's University Press plans to reissue it in a paperback edition in April.

The title speaks volumes.

Born into a Montreal Orthodox Jewish family whose values he challenged, Richler was a rebel whose sardonic and richly observed novels sometimes offend the overly sensitive in Montreal's Jewish community.



Richler, whose life was cut short in the summer of 2001, left Montreal as an aspiring writer, his head spinning with dreams of becoming a latter-day Ernest Hemingway. He returned as a published novelist, his resumé bolstered by The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz and Joshua Then and Now.

Never having painted himself into a corner artistically, Richler also wrote children's books (Jacob Two-Two and the Hooded Fang), political works (Oh Canada! Oh Quebec! Requiem for a Divided Country), essays (Hunting Tigers Under Glass), screenplays, radio and television plays and newspaper and magazine articles.

To say that he had an eclectic range would have been an understatement.

Richler began writing at an early age, but the stinging wit that would be his hallmark did not manifest itself until much later.

He was raised in a dysfunctional household, his mother, Lily, having annulled her marriage to her husband, Moe. Richler, much to his family's annoyance, mined this rich vein of material.

A graduate of Baron Byng High School, he was an indifferent student, not having attained a sufficient grade average to enter McGill University. He got into second-tier Sir George Williams University, but in his second year, he dropped out, having grown bored of being a student.

His horizons stifled by the narrowness of his upbringing, he set sail to Europe at 19 in an attempt to reinvent himself. Kramer, an assiduous researcher, traces Richler's journey from Britain and France to the Balearic island of Ibiza, where he wrote a highly biographical novel, The Rotten People, which remains unpublished to this day.

Bubbling with youthful energy and creativity, he submitted stories to The New Yorker and Harper's, but they were rejected. His prospects cloudy and his money gone, he returned to Montreal, finding a job as a CBC radio news writer on the graveyard shift.

Richler, his sights set higher, finally produced a publishable novel, The Acrobats, which, as Kramer observes, was so derivative that all his later themes were set out there.

In Kramer's view, Richler's next novel, Son of a Smaller Hero, was an effort "to turn himself into a modern, Gentile writer." Certain that it would be controversial, he and his publisher consulted a lawyer about possible libel suits.

Not surprisingly, the book upset his family and aroused indignation in the Jewish community, some of whose outraged members hurled accusations of anti-Semitism at him.

To Kramer, The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz was a great leap forward, enabling Richler to demonstrate that he was "the first major Canadian voice to step outside the British and French traditions."

Some years on, at a première of a film based on this novel, the wife of Montreal liquor tycoon Sam Bronfman approached Richler and said, "Well, Mordecai, you've come a long way from being a St. Urbain Street slum boy." To which he apparently retorted, "Well, Saidye, you've come a long way from being a bootlegger's wife."

In 1962, Richler visited Israel, having secured an assignment from Maclean's to profile it. He was humbled by Israel's accomplishments, but none too impressed by kibbutzim.

Three decades later, on his second and last trip to Israel, he detected parallels between early Zionists and Palestinian nationalists. His impressions were published in The New Yorker and in a book, This Year in Jerusalem.

Kramer contends that Solomon Gursky Was Here, released in 1989, was his greatest novel, "Dickensian in scope and brilliantly eccentric."

Kramer is not as charitable in his judgment of Richler's harsh assessment of Quebec nationalists. As he puts it, "He was still operating within World War II categories – a bas les Juifs! and gang fights on Park Avenue."

During his final years, Kramer notes, Richler mellowed and spoke of revisiting Israel and going to Poland to trace his ancestral roots. He never went, his cancer having returned in 1998. Richler hoped to "beat the rap," but he died as his doctors debated whether surgery would be useful.

He was buried in Montreal's Mount Royal cemetery, which, as every Montrealer knows, overlooks St. Urbain Street. He had come full circle.

Maccabees captures women's hockey title

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

While the men were hard pressed to even make the playoffs of the Canadian Multicultural Hockey Championships, the Israeli Maccabees women's team coasted into the title game, emerging with a 2-1 win over the European Sirens to capture top honours in the women's division.

The Maccabees compiled a 4-1 record overall, racking up wins over teams representing Japan (5-2), Italy (3-2) and China (5-0), as well as the Sirens. The only blemish on their record was a 3-1 loss to the Sirens in a round-robin game in which the Maccabees, with a playoff spot assured, more or less played possum, said Ashley Wronzberg, manager, coach and player with the Maccabees.

The championship game was a tight affair. Following a scoreless first period, the Maccabees registered a shorthanded goal, which was followed by another tally at the tail end of a penalty. Emerging from the sin bin, Teri Goodfellow took a stretch pass at their opponents' blue line and walked in alone on the Sirens goaltender, burying her shot.

The Sirens scored early in the third and much of the rest of the period was played in the Maccabees' end, Wronzberg said. However, the Maccabees played probably their best period of the tournament, checking the Sirens relentlessly and riding the hot hand of 15-year-old goaltender Marissa Kozovski of the Etobicoke Dolphins for the win.

Wronzberg, who plays for the Toronto Sirens of the Golden Blades Women's Hockey League, said most of the Maccabees' lineup consisted of young women "who don't want to quit playing just yet."

The Maccabees had players from a variety of leagues, including a few from the Golden Blades League and one who plays in a men's senior circuit. Most, as it happened, played high school hockey earlier in their careers.

Wronzberg couldn't find enough players to ice a dedicated Israeli team last year, so she joined three other Jewish girls on Team World, which lost in overtime in the semi-finals.

Four years ago, the last time "Israel" iced a team, they finished fifth out of six entrants.

Though they were division winners, the Maccabees could have been even better, Wronzberg said. Three players who expressed interest in the multicultural tournament play college hockey in the NCAA, but were unable to get a release or had to return to their schools.

Still, those who played "had a great time. We had better results than we expected," she said.

Stars of David dethroned as champions

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It's hard to repeat as champions. Just ask the Detroit Red Wings and the Israeli Stars of David.

Though both rosters are stocked with star players – the Red Wings with legitimate Hall of Famers, the Davids with, ahem, "Stars" – both had their hopes for a repeat dashed in their recent championship outings.

The Stars of David bowed out without reaching the medal round at the recently concluded Canadian Multicultural Hockey Championships after compiling a mediocre 1-2-1 record. A year earlier, they stunned everyone by winning the title, defeating perennial contenders Polish Hussars 4-3 in the title game.

For the 2009 event, played during the holiday season at Chesswood Arena, the Stars entered with high hopes. But early injuries – top gun Shawn Frank of Dalhousie University went out early in the first game – plus the unavailability of premier players such as Alon Eizenman spelled doom for the Stars, said the team's general manager and co-coach, Alex Voihanski.

Still, the Stars started strong, dispatching the Nubian Kings 8-0 in the opener and leading some to believe the Stars would again be contenders.

However, as champs the Stars "had targets on their backs," with their opponents coming out hard every game, Voihanski said.

Game 2 provided a dose of reality, as the Stars, already without Frank and with captain Stacey Britstone "banged up," lost 5-3 to the Iroquois Silverhawks in a "chippy" affair, said Voihanski.

Game 3 saw the Stars face off against the Macedonian Lions, but despite outplaying them throughout, the Stars came away with a 3-3 tie.

"They had a late goal on a two-man advantage to tie," Voihanski said.

The Stars needed a tie or win in the last game to join seven other playoff teams in the 12-team premier division. Playing their fourth game in two nights, they iced a depleted lineup.

The team had lost defenceman Ryan Goldberg to injury and defenceman Cody Schindermann was ejected early on, leaving the Stars with only two natural defencemen. Forwards were asked to play back and the team couldn't ice three full lines. Not unexpectedly, they ran out of gas and dropped a 5-2 decision to the Hellenic Lightning.

The Lightning lost in the semis to Irish Shamrocks, who went on to defeat the Polish Hussars 5-0 in the title game.

Voihanski said the Stars are a competitive group, but he acknowledged it's tough to put together a winning lineup when many good players have other commitments.

The perennially best teams in the tournament play together year round, while the Stars come together shortly before the first game, get a couple of practices under their belts and then take to the ice in meaningful games.

Voihanski said stellar performances from Aaron Stein, who plays for the University of Western Ontario, and Bryan Weinberg of the Mississauga Chargers were instrumental in keeping the team competitive. Voihanski was joined as coach by Oren Rubin, who managed the defence.

I've got it maid

NEW TO CANADA
By NINA SHENHAV

I seem like a nice person. Aside from my husband, my kids and a couple hundred friends who know the truth, I'm quite all right. I volunteer a lot, I like myself (and sometimes even others) and, all in all, I go to bed with a clean conscience.

That's the thing. My conscience is clean, but my house isn't.

It's not that I hate cleaning, it's that I loathe it. Bloody battles with Meir end with me locking myself in the bedroom while he strolls around the rest of the house with a wet rag, mop and some dusters.

In the end, I do leave my safe room, but only to let him air out the blankets, scrub the bath and kiss poor little me.

A month ago, Meir called me into our room for a talk. Usually he shrouds his demure gaze and asks me to stop spending so much money on my unique collection of porcelain witches. But this time, he said stuff like, "Things are going to be different from now on!" (Is it my fault those damned witches are so amiable?)

Then he said sharply, "We're hiring a maid."

I said nothing. He wants to waste his money? Go ahead.

The next morning, Mrs. Maid arrived at my house, awakening me brutally. She was big and strong, and she demanded a big and a strong cappuccino. I went out and got her a nice cup from our neighbourhood café.

I'm not sure she was satisfied, though.

I entered my room and closed the door behind me, in order to commit myself to my regular routine (sprawling on my bed, and observing the ceiling), but after a few hours, I noticed that I was hearing nothing from the outside world, so I got up and found Mrs. Maid browsing the morning papers.

I nudged the bucket and the rag, but it made no impression on her. I also circulated around her a bit, coughing against the broom. Finally, I became afraid that she'd ask me to go out in the cold again and get her another cappuccino, so I ran back to my room and waited.

After five hours, I couldn't take it anymore. I shoved some bills into her big palm and set her free.

I had to leave home, too. It was more dirty and messy then before, so I called up a friend and went to the mall to recuperate with a nice hot latté. I felt so bourgeois, you know, sitting and drinking coffee and bitching about my maid.

When Meir came home, he said nothing. He cleaned up the mess in three short hours, but he didn't complain.

He wanted a maid? He has a maid.

I mean, not exactly. I told her not to come anymore, but I tell Meir that she still does.

With her salary I buy myself stuff and go to the movies.

Meir can't tell the difference (and he even says nothing about my growing collection of witches).

I still go to bed in an unclean house, but these days, my conscience isn't that clean anymore.

This year, burn off the fat

FITNESS CORNER
By FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

This year, I want to inspire you to achieve long-term weight loss. It's not complicated really. Fat loss is about numbers.

I'm sure you've heard this before: if you expend more calories then you take in, you lose weight. That's true, but to achieve one pound of weight loss, you must produce a 3,500 calorie deficit, and you must create that deficit without depriving your body of food. If your body doesn't get the nutrition it needs, it will break down muscle and then bone to feed itself, leaving you with more fat in the end.

To effectively take off fat and keep it off, you need to eat and burn calories every day. That's where exercise comes in.

I found a great website – healthstatus. com/calculate/cbc – that tells you how many calories you burn based on how much you weigh, so I put a list together of some activities, assuming a 155-pound person doing each activity for 60 minutes.

Running at five miles per hour burns 595 calories, but running at eight m/ph burns 948 calories. Walking two m/ph burns 195 calories, while walking at five m/ph burns 362 calories. Yoga and power yoga both burn 362 calories, but hot yoga burns 492 calories. Sitting for an hour burns only 74 calories, while going shopping burns 167 calories. Riding a stationary bike at eight to 10 m/ph burns 492 calories, but if you take it up a notch to a spinning class, you burn 799 calories.

Skiing downhill burns 613 calories an hour, but cross-country skiing burns 799 calories. Play tennis doubles for an hour and you burn 297 calories, but turn it into a one-on-one match and you burn 427 calories.

Light weightlifting burns 241 calories, while heavy weightlifting burns 427 calories an hour.

So get out there and do something this year.

E-mail me at felycesfitness@rogers.com to learn more.

URBAN WRITER

It's 2 a.m., and Roz Gelade might be walking through your backyard.

A little while ago, Roz, the president of Fostering Felines Cat Rescue, rescued a six-year-old brown tabby by the name of Bruno. He was about to go into an adoptive home, but instead he got away. Only days before, he had been shaven in a lion cut, so his fur was very thin.

Roz and some dedicated volunteers put out cat cages, and she recruited other volunteers to look for Bruno, including me. (Recently, I became one of Roz's board members.) It was indeed 2 a.m.

Roz came by to pick me up in her proud yet dishevelled mobile office, with notebooks, cages and food scattered throughout. I smiled as I always do with Roz, because I am so incredibly proud of her for doing what she loves, and for doing it well.

I told her we had to first stop at an all-night convenience store for some hot chocolate. We did. So there we were, in the wee hours of the night, hanging out in front of that store, sipping a hot drink and shmoozing. At 49 years of age, that made me very happy. It's good to hang.

She told me how sad she was that Bruno was out in the cold alone.

You think to yourself, "Cats? That's nuts. Why would anyone give time to saving a cat when they could save or help a person?"

Roz might agree with that, or something close to it. Her love for cats, she told me, enhances her love for people. Animal activists like Roz are refreshing, because many of them are so stridently anti-human. But Roz isn't like that.

Five years ago, she started rescuing cats, fostering them out and then finding them adoptive homes – or "forever homes," as she calls them. Later, she was instrumental in launching the first Canadian spay/neuter clinic. Recently, Roz orchestrated the amalgamation of two cat rescue organizations. She is a pioneer, an innovator, a not-for-profit entrepreneur in an industry dotted with some very extraordinary people.

Like the prophets who loved animals – such as Moses, who went after a lone sheep – Roz is a compassionate and resourceful animal lover. She's the real deal. She should run the Humane Society.

It was cold, and standing around meant fidgeting in somebody's backyard in the middle of the night. The cat wasn't waiting for us in the cages. They were empty. But slowly, meticulously and with soft, loving care, Roz placed a folded blanket under the cages so the metal wouldn't freeze, and therefore the cat wouldn't, either.

We drove up to my condo at 3:30 a.m. and talked for a little while. Roz was still melancholy because Bruno was nowhere to be found. But, she said, "maybe he will be soon and things will be alright."

I told her to read the story of Jacob, who didn't know if Joseph, his son, was dead or alive and, therefore, couldn't mourn or celebrate – a terrible condition for a loved one to be in. She did. It helped. We talked about the importance of developing a philosophy of suffering.

Despite all the fun that people have at her expense – calling her "cat lady" – Roz has never wavered from her dreams, her very humane and compassionate dreams of rescuing, fostering, adopting out and protecting the cat population.

So if you see the bushes in your backyard moving late one night and start to reach for your rifle, look more closely. It might be a very special person acting out her dreams, repairing the world while whispering to a wild cat, "Everything will be OK."

It might be Roz Gelade.

Saving lives amid the ruins

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Jewish federations and other Jewish organizations are mobilizing to help Haitians suffering the devastating effects of last week's 7.0 magnitude earthquake, the strongest one in Haiti in 200 years.

But amid the news of staggering amounts of death, injury and property damage, including damage to both the National Palace and United Nations peacekeeping mission's headquarters, there was unexpected good news at the Toronto offices of Ve'ahavta – the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, which recently became involved with a Haitian orphanage – the aptly named House of Hope, in Port-au-Prince, 12 kilometres from the epicentre of the earthquake.

"We just got word late this morning that, miraculously, the orphanage is still standing and all the kids are still alive, while villagers have died and are coming to the orphanage for respite," Avrum Rosensweig, Ve'ahavta's president and founder, told The CJN last Thursday.

Please see related stories on pages 4, 8, 9 and 31

A Ve'ahavta board member had sent the orphanage a satellite phone with a visiting medical group, Rosensweig said.

"We were all braced to get the worst news, that these 200 children had perished," Rosensweig said. Sadly, he added that the number of orphans needing services in Haiti will increase dramatically. "This tears at all our heartstrings. The Jewish People is very familiar with tragedy."

Ironically, a small group of Ve'ahavta staff members would have arrived in Haiti on the day of the earthquake.

With a per capita income of $3.60 per day, Haiti is the most impoverished country in the Western Hemisphere and thus especially vulnerable to natural disasters, a Ve'ahavta news release stated last week.

As of Monday morning, six days after the Jan. 12 disaster, Ve'ahavta had collected $152,000 for its Haiti Earthquake Relief Fund.

The News in Brief

Canada

Shabbat For Darfur

TORONTO — A cross-Canada Darfur Shabbat will take place on Jan. 22 and 23, in which rabbis and synagogues of all denominations, from Victoria to St. John's, are being urged to dedicate part of their Sabbath service or program to bringing about an end to the genocide in Sudan's Darfur region. Flyers on how to take action will be available in shuls during Darfur Shabbat. Details are available at www.cjc.ca/darfur, Canadian Jewish Congress said.

Churchill Play Staged

WINNIPEG — The controversial 10-minute play Seven Jewish Children by British playwright Caryl Churchill will be staged Jan. 24 as part of a festival devoted to her work Jan. 21 to Feb. 8 in Winnipeg. It's one of 17 Churchill plays in the city's ninth annual Master Playwright Festival. Past artists highlighted included Samuel Beckett, David Mamet and Bertolt Brecht. The play, about Israel's Gaza invasion last winter, has been staged in a number of Canadian cities. It has been criticized as anti-Israel and anti-Semitic, with some saying it likens Israelis to Nazis.

World

Gies Found Diary

AMSTERDAM — Miep Gies, the woman who recovered Anne Frank's diary, has died Jan. 11 at age 100 in the Netherlands. Gies was the last surviving member of the small group that hid Frank and her family from the Nazis. After the family's arrest by the Gestapo in 1944, Gies returned to the attic where they hid and found the diary. She always denied her heroism. "I stand at the end of the long, long line of good Dutch people who did what I did and more," she once said. Israeli President Shimon Peres sent the Dutch queen condolences on her death.

Shooter Gets Life

SEATTLE — The man who shot and killed one woman and wounded five others at the Jewish Federation of Greater Seattle in July 2006 was sentenced to life in jail. At his sentencing Jan. 14, Naveed Haq, 34, apologized "from the depth of my being" and blamed his poorly treated mental illness for his actions. A jury last month found Haq guilty of all eight counts against him. It agreed with the prosecution that he knew what he was doing. A previous jury was deadlocked, precipitating a second trial.

'Zionists' Blamed

TEHRAN — Iran's foreign ministry said "Zionists and American agents" planted a remote-controlled bomb in a motorcycle that killed Iranian nuclear scientist Massoud Ali-Mohammadi, 50, outside his home Jan. 12. But reformist websites hinted the Tehran University professor's endorsement of a rival to President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in last year's election rather that his possible work on Iran's nuclear program may have been why he was killed.

Pope Urges Dialogue

ROME — Pope Benedict XVI urged "universal recognition" of both Israel's right to exist and the right of Palestinians to a state. In his traditional New Year's address Jan. 11 to diplomats accredited to the Vatican, the Pope said that on his Mideast trip last May, he "urgently appealed" for dialogue and respect between Israelis and Palestinians.

City Worker Probed Over Anti-Jewish Sites

CALGARY — A city worker in Calgary is being probed for allegedly running at least two anti-Jewish websites.

A "full investigation" of the unnamed 56-year-old foreman with the city's parks and recreation department was launched Jan. 11 after the existence of at least two anti-Jewish blogs, both linked to the man, was revealed to city officials, the Calgary Herald reported.

"We just became aware of the issue, so we are doing our investigation to determine an appropriate response," city solicitor Paul Tolley was quoted as saying. "We need to determine a few facts, and then we can respond to this."

The sites in question include a blog and a Facebook page. They contain links to conspiracy theories and writings condemning Jews as racist, power hungry and corrupt.

The Herald reported that it does not appear that the man actually writes the material, though anti-Semitic content apparently penned by the same man can be found on many other online comment forums.

In an e-mail to the paper, the man denied running the blog, jewwatchskullnboner.blogspot.com. As of Jan. 13, the blog was inactive.

Officials said the city's code of conduct for staff can include behaviour and actions outside of work hours.

Full-body scans OK to save lives, rabbis say

Rabbi Reuven Bulka

Security devices installed at a number of Canadian airports

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

Full-body scanners are already in some Canadian airports, and more are coming soon. The question for many observant Jews is whether these scanners create a halachic problem (one related to Jewish Law) for Jewish travellers.

That is, will these new security measures breach the laws of modesty observed by traditional Jews, both male and female? This may, in fact, be the case, some Canadian rabbis say.

Full-body scans use technology that provides a three-dimensional image of a person's body underneath the clothing. Transport Canada believes this "virtual strip search" technology will be less objectionable to the majority of Canadians than a physical search.

While those being scanned are not actively revealing themselves, "their dignity is being compromised," says Ottawa's Rabbi Reuven Bulka, a rabbinic emissary for Canadian Jewish Congress and an immediate past Congress co-president.

However, that dignity must always be balanced by what he sees as the government's "right and responsibility to do whatever is necessary in order to protect its citizens.

"It would be wrong for us as a matter of principle to stand in the way of what they're doing to protect the country," Rabbi Bulka says.

Several unanswered questions could resolve concerns, he adds. "Who exactly sees it? What exactly does it show?" Without obstructing security, travellers should always have the right to know the answers to those questions, and to "request that their screening be done by someone of the same gender."

"I don't understand what the whole fuss is about," says Rabbi Jay Kelman, founder of Toronto's Torah in Motion and a CJN columnist, particularly given the government's reassurances about the type of images that will be available. To save a life, it's permitted to violate almost every Torah prohibition, he says. "Adultery is an exception… [but] this is not adultery."

Rabbi Kelman does question whether full-body scanners are the best means of ensuring travellers' security. "Is this the most effective means of screening terrorists?"

A lesson learned

From the editor's desk...

Even among our very first moments some 3,500 years ago around the mountain in Sinai called Chorev, we, the Jewish People, were instructed to help the downtrodden and the suffering.

It was a lesson we learned well. And it was a lesson that has been put into action by every generation in its own time and in its own way, according to the needs of the hour.

In the news pages of this edition of The CJN, we have provided a general story reporting primarily on the mobilization into action of many of our Canadian communal organizations after the destruction and chaos in Haiti. The Jewish response, however, has been from communities around the world.

In this column, I wish to provide more information about that response to the catastrophe, specifically by Israel-based organizations.

It should be remembered that Israel has a long history of immediately responding to peoples and countries struck by natural or man-made disasters. In the recent past, Israel has sent rescue teams to:

- Kenya in 2006 to help save lives after the collapse of a 50-storey building.
- China in 2004 after a car bomb demolished the China Hilton.
- Kenya in 2003 following a terror strike at the Mombasa Hotel.
- India in 2001 after a massive earthquake.
- Northwestern Turkey in 1999 following an earthquake.
- Greece in 1999 following an earthquake.

And there were additional instances in Kenya again, and in Argentina, Armenia and Mexico.

* * *

At the cabinet meeting in Israel this past Sunday, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu made the following statement:

"I would like to say a few words about the horrific tragedy that took place in Haiti. What happened there is a large-scale disaster of very great proportions. The lack of protective measures only deepened the tragedy. I think that it is our obligation, as the State of Israel, as the state of the Jewish People, to mobilize immediately – and this we have done…

"This is in the best tradition of the Jewish People; this is the true covenant of the State of Israel and the Jewish People… despite being a small country, we have responded with a big heart. The fact is… that this was an expression of our Jewish heritage and the Jewish ethic of helping one's fellow. I hope that the [IDF] team saves lives and that Haiti succeeds in recovering from this awful tragedy."

The IDF medical and rescue team set up a field hospital in Port-Au-Prince and is treating patients there – injured children from different disaster-struck areas.

There are also two search and rescue groups who, along with specially trained search dogs, are locating and rescuing survivors trapped in ruined buildings, including many who were injured during the collapse of the UN headquarters. The Israelis are scheduled to stay in Haiti for a minimum of two weeks.

* * *

IsraAID, a non-governmental organization, supported by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the American Jewish Committee, B'nai Brith International, the Jewish Federation of Metropolitan Chicago and other federations in North America, sent a team of medical professionals to Haiti.

The IsraAID group is treating patients and has joined local physicians at the site of the collapsed central hospital where thousands of wounded need help.

According to IsraAID's press release, it set up treatment rooms in four empty rooms at the crumbled hospital, treating patients with intravenous and other medications. In light of the scale of the disaster, the IsraAID press release noted, it is preparing an additional team of volunteers to be sent next week.

* * *

Israel's renowned post-disaster identification unit, ZAKA, arrived in Haiti wearing their distinctive, high-gloss yellow vests.

ZAKA is an acronym in Hebrew for Zikui Korbanot Ason (Identification of the Victims of Disaster).

In its press release, the organization stated that "on arrival, the ZAKA delegation was dispatched to the collapsed eight-storey university building where cries could be heard from the trapped students. After 38 hours of work around the clock, working with a Mexican military delegation and other Jewish volunteers from Mexico, the ZAKA volunteers succeeded Saturday [Shabbat] in pulling eight students alive from the rubble."

Search, rescue and saving lives are what we were commanded to do far back in time at Chorev. And we have been doing it ever since.

Expelled members launch lawsuit against B'nai Brith

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) is being sued by nine former or current members for what they call "oppressive" and "unfairly prejudicial" conduct that led to their expulsions.

The plaintiffs are seeking $990,000 in damages plus reinstatement as members in good standing. They're also asking the Ontario Superior Court of Justice to compel B'nai Brith Canada to produce its bank records, to appoint inspectors "to investigate the affairs of BBC," and to declare much of the organization's new constitution invalid.

B'nai Brith has filed a defence denying the allegations. The claims have yet to be proven in court.

The case arises out of a dispute between several longstanding senior members of the organization – who were expelled – and the organization's leadership over a number of alleged irregularities. The former members contend that B'nai Brith directors have wrested control of the organization from its members, who are organized in lodges, and that B'nai Brith "has used tactics amounting to intimidation" to silence opposition.

Claim alleges BBC tried to 'limit [the] functions and powers of the individual lodges'

The plaintiffs allege that intimidation by B'nai Brith has been implemented through changes to the organization's constitution, "provisions that were never properly enacted by the members in accordance with the bylaws of the BBC, or presented to and approved by the Ministry of Industry (Canada) as statutorily required, in order to suppress any criticism of the management of the BBC or requests for financial accountability."

The plaintiffs further allege that B'nai Brith officers have failed to abide by rules governing disclosure of audited financial statements at the group's 2006 annual general meeting.

B'nai Brith's statement of defence rejected allegations of constitutional misdeeds, saying any changes were conducted in accordance with legal norms and were upheld by a court of B'nai Brith International (BBI), which is empowered to adjudicate internal disagreements.

The plaintiffs were expelled from B'nai Brith after a disciplinary committee hearing in January 2008 for "conduct unbecoming a member." The plaintiffs – who include Lou Ronson, a former B'nai Brith national president and a member since 1939, and former national president Harvey Crestohl – allege the disciplinary committee hearing was fraught with legal and procedural errors "such that the plaintiffs were thereby denied a fair hearing conducted in accordance with the principles of natural justice."

They say they were never informed who laid the complaint against them or what specific conduct merited expulsion. As well, they say they weren't permitted to cross-examine their accusers, they weren't allowed to present submissions on their own behalf, and that the hearing was adjourned with a request for disclosure of documents still pending.

Their statement of claim alleges B'nai Brith has tried to "limit [the] functions and powers of the individual lodges and their members." Further, they allege that B'nai Brith's directors have failed to provide "complete and frank disclosure of the financial affairs as required of the BBC, and enlightenment as to the governance of the BBC.

"The plaintiffs state and the fact is that the directors of the BBC have effectively taken control of the organization from its membership, and in part by way of the taking of such control, failed to provide details of contracts involving themselves and other associated bodies of which they have direction."

B'nai Brith's statement of defence asserts that the group's constitution requires "any concerns, conflicts, controversies or disputes are to be raised and dealt with exclusively within the BBC structure," which includes appeals of disciplinary committee findings.

The defence acknowledges that "many of the plaintiffs were longstanding members of BBC and BBI. However, the plaintiffs' tenure and past accomplishments did not insulate them from subsequently engaging in conduct unbecoming a member of these organizations."

The defence alleges that in late 2005 and early 2006, a number of B'nai Brith members "began circulating defamatory documents which made allegations about the organization and the methods by which it was operating. This group of members eventually began calling themselves the Concerned Members of BBC (CMOBBC)."

The statement of defence goes on to say that the CMOBBC circulated a document at B'nai Brith's annual general meeting in June 2006 that contained "serious and unsubstantiated allegations against BBC and its leadership. The statement was signed by a number of BBC members identifying themselves as members of the CMOBBC."

Haiti's cry is our call

"You have to understand that the situation is true madness, and the more time passes, there are more and more bodies, in numbers that cannot be grasped. It is beyond comprehension," said Mati Goldstein, the head of the six-man delegation from ZAKA, the volunteer organization from Israel that specializes in disaster victim identification.

Goldstein was of course referring to the hellish aftermath of last week's earthquake in Haiti.

As of this writing, it's feared that as many as 200,000 people may have been killed by the quake. The final gruesome number will not be told until the rubble of the destruction is lifted away.

The city of Port-au-Prince has been devastated. More than a quarter of a million people are actually now living on the streets there. Perhaps a third of the country's entire population of some nine million people are believed to be in need of assistance simply to get to the next day.

Corpses are piled in the streets. Corpses protrude from beneath crumbled structures. Corpses are buried in mass graves.

Men, women and children, dazed by the sheer unfathomability and tsunami-like force of what happened, roam the streets, looking and mostly not finding, the people who were once their family.

An IsraAID doctor tends a patient

We have all seen and been moved by the sorrowful images. We have all heard and been pierced by the tearful sobbing of the survivors.

We express our most profound condolences to all the sufferers and survivors of this disaster. We hope they will find in the distant quiet of days yet to come whatever comfort memory may bring to them.

Their cry today, however, is our call.

We – the citizens of the world – must respond to ensure first that the lives of the earthquake survivors are safe and secure. No one can help Haitians retrieve what they have lost. But we can try to help the country put in place ways and means to rebuild what has been destroyed.

We are grateful for and proud of our government's swift and unequivocal response to the suffering in Haiti. And we are especially proud of the immediate, generous, giving response from across the wide diversity of the Jewish world to the unbelievable disaster that has befallen the people of Haiti.

The Jewish community understands the essential nature of our obligation. It is not a matter of charity. It is a matter of justice.

Haiti's cry is our call. Respond.

Access to Israel's holy sites

Regarding the recent news item concerning access to the Western Wall, the Canada-Israel Committee reaffirms its view that the pluralistic nature of Israel is an essential value that characterizes the Jewish state ("A Day at the Kotel," Dec. 24). There must be equal access to Israel's holy sites for all whose approach is respectful and anchored in a genuine desire to give expression to the deep spiritual sentiments the Western Wall evokes.

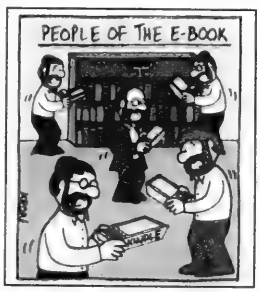
Funding of services for Israeli Arabs

Brian Rothberg repeats the canard that Israeli Arabs "receive less funding for municipal, educational and health services," but neglects to mention that one of the major reasons for this is that Israeli Arabs pay less in taxes ("Discrimination against Israeli Arabs," Letters, Jan. 14). Writing in the Jerusalem Post last year, columnist Seth Frantzman pointed out that only 18 per cent of Israeli Arabs pay municipal taxes, while 53 per cent of Israeli Jews do. This is not, as some claim, because Arabs are unable to pay more. Municipal taxes are based on the size of houses, but statistics in Arab villages are notoriously inaccurate, with the result that many people are taxed less than they should be.



Rothberg then gives proof to the assertion that a lie repeated often enough becomes the truth, when he refers to the West Bank as "land that no international law sanctions as Israel's." In 1991, Eugene Rostow, undersecretary of state in the Johnson administration, demonstrated conclusively, based on a clear reading of international law, that "the Jews have the same right to settle there as they have to settle in Haifa." It is only through repetition of the claim of illegality by Israel's foes that supporters of Israel such as Rothberg have come to believe it is true. While international opinion may claim Israel's "occupation" is illegal, international law does not, unless it is twisted well beyond the framers' original intentions.

Finally, Rothberg complains that checkpoints go "far beyond security needs." Yet recently we saw what happens when supposedly "unnecessary" checkpoints are dismantled, with the tragic murder of a father of seven. While I applaud Rothberg's concern for the "other," I ask him to just occasionally spare a thought for his own, too.

Rights of Israeli Arabs

I don't worry too much about the rights of Israeli Arabs, because they have more rights than most Muslims living throughout the Islamic world ("Discrimination against Israeli Arabs," Letters, Jan. 14). I don't worry about Jews hating Muslims, because I know that it is not a real problem. But I do worry about the increasingly violent political, intellectual and religious hate against Jews and Israel by Muslims.

I also worry about the people of Israel, who continue to be threatened by terrorism, advanced weapons imported by Hezbollah and Hamas, the growing hatred and desire to punish Israel – materially and militarily – by left wingers in many western countries, and the radicalism that has Muslims killing one another and targeting most everyone else.

Jewish 'Earth Day'

Many contemporary Jews look on Tu b'Shvat (Jan. 29-30 this year) as a Jewish "Earth Day" and use Tu b'Shvat seders as occasions to discuss how Jewish values can be applied to reduce many of today's ecological threats. This is now more important than ever.

While Judaism teaches that "the Earth is the Lord's" (Psalms 24:1), and that we are to be partners with God in preserving the environment, there are daily news reports about water shortages, air and water pollution, rapid species extinction and soil erosion and depletion. Tu b'Shvat is the New Year for Trees, the date on which the fate of trees is decided for the coming year. Hence, it is an ideal time to consider the rapid destruction of tropical rain forests and other valuable habitats. While we are already facing many negative effects of rapid global climate change, recent scientific reports have projected that the earth's average temperature will increase by 2 degrees Fahrenheit to 11 degrees Fahrenheit in a century, and this would have catastrophic impacts on ecosystems and humanity.

While Israel has made remarkable progress in many areas, it faces the worst drought in its history, badly polluted rivers, severe air pollution in its major cities and industrial areas, rapidly declining open space, congested roads, and an inadequate mass transit system. I urge Jews to use Tu b'Shvat and activities related to this increasingly important holiday as occasions to start to make tikkun olam, the repair and healing of the planet, a central focus in Jewish life today.

Denying campus anti-Semitism isn't helpful

Parliamentarians from around the world met in London, England, just over a year ago for the inaugural meeting of the Inter-parliamentary Committee for Combating Antisemitism. As a followup to the London conference, and in accordance with the principal resolution that emanated from it, the Canadian Parliamentary Coalition for Combating Antisemitism (CPCCA) was established.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Comprising 22 members of Parliament from all parties in the House of Commons, the CPCCA is proceeding to address its key objective, which is to explore, confront, and combat anti-Semitism in Canada today. Although its mandate is broad – with the intent of examining the diverse nature of contemporary anti-Semitism in its many permutations – the coalition has so far chosen to focus more particularly on the evident rise in anti-Semitic activity at Canadian universities.

More than 55 "expert witnesses" have so far testified before coalition members, with further hearings still to come. Reading their transcripts, or listening to their recorded discussions (http: \www.cpcca.ca), is informative, though somewhat predictable.

While many of the scholars and student groups who have already expressed their views recognize the scourge of mounting anti-Semitism on their campuses – manifested primarily by demonization and delegitimization of Israel – and are both willing to label it as such and speak to the chilled academic environment that it has created, there are, of course, those who disagree.

Notably, it's the university administrators who have seemed most inclined to downplay the extent and seriousness of the issue, often couching their remarks in ivory tower jargon or non-committal platitudes. This isn't surprising, since the last thing they'd want to do is sound any alarm bells that might threaten their student enrolment or fundraising capabilities.

What's curious, therefore, is why the CPCCA has renewed its call for more of the institutional leadership to be at a further hearing on Jan. 25. Of the initial invitations that went out to the presidents of 25 of our major universities to attend a session last November, only one made a presentation in person, and just four others sent their representatives. Given their apparent disinterest, coupled with the expectation that their testimony will likely differ little from what has already been conveyed by a sampling of their proxies, it's unclear what benefit there might be in encouraging them to attend en masse.

As reported on the CPCCA website, one expert witness told the inquiry that "Canada is a pioneer of campus anti-Semitism among democratic nations." This charge that should attract the attention of anyone who wishes to make the halls of our academy safer and more hospitable for Jewish students and faculty. Denying that the problem exists is not helpful.

IDF policies in West Bank aren't capricious

Israeli military commanders often find themselves between a rock and a hard place. In the West Bank, they're required to perform a delicate balancing act between their responsibility for Israelis' safety and their international law obligations to ensure, as far as possible, normal civil life for Palestinians. The case of Route 443 is the latest to have come to the public's attention.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

Route 443 is a 26-kilometre highway connecting northern Jerusalem to an interchange on the main Tel Aviv-Jerusalem highway. It's now the second-most-popular route for people travelling to the capital from the country's central area and connects the burgeoning town of Modi'in to Tel Aviv and Jerusalem.

The highway was completed during the 1990s. Its eastern 14 kilometres run through the West Bank. Privately owned Palestinian lands were expropriated to enable paving parts of it. Until 2000, this segment was used by Israelis and Palestinians alike. It served Palestinians in adjacent towns and villages and provided them quick access to two regional centres, Ramallah and El Bireh. Palestinian buses and taxis freely travelled the road, as did private, commercial, medical and agricultural vehicles.

That ended after the onset of the second intifadah in October 2000. Israeli vehicles travelling on 443 became targets of Palestinian attacks. Stones and Molotov cocktails were daily occurrences. Gunshots fired from passing vehicles or stationary ambushes became common. People were injured. From December 2000 to August 2002, five Israelis were killed along the route. Commanders reacted by adding patrols and lookout posts. Fences were erected along parts of the road. At one point, tanks were stationed on the hillsides surrounding it. These measures didn't suffice, and eventually Palestinian vehicular travel on the highway was limited and later prohibited.

From 2004 to 2007, I served as the Israel Defence Forces' legal adviser in the West Bank. During this period, we received complaints regarding travel restrictions on 443, claiming that banning Palestinian traffic on the road contravened both international and Israeli domestic law; that the IDF wasn't properly balancing its obligations under the rules of belligerent occupation, and that 443 had effectively become an internal Israeli road. Some organizations equated Israel's policy to apartheid.

In July 2007, the Association for Civil Rights in Israel (ACRI), representing Palestinian villages affected by the travel restrictions, petitioned the Supreme Court. Besides the assertions detailed above, ACRI claimed IDF policy on 443 was disproportionate, because means less harmful to Palestinians could be adopted to ensure Israelis' safety on the road.

The state replied, explaining the travel restrictions' military necessity and describing a series of alternative roads paved for Palestinians within the framework of the security barrier project, roads aimed at connecting Palestinian towns and villages adversely affected by 443 travel restrictions and the barrier. These roads shorten travel time from outlying villages to central towns, but don't provide access as quickly as 443. It added that the IDF was implementing a plan to allow some Palestinian vehicles to travel on the road.

In December, the Supreme Court published its judgment in the case, finding for the petitioners. The majority ruled that the IDF wasn't authorized to turn 443 into an "internal Israeli" road, reiterating a position that roads paved on expropriated Palestinian lands could benefit both Palestinians and Israelis, but not only the "occupying power," particularly when such policy would last a long time.

The full panel declared the travel restrictions' military advantage disproportionate to the harm they inflicted upon Palestinians and that alternatives hadn't been properly considered. In summation, the majority gave the IDF five months to implement a plan that would safely renew Palestinian travel on 443.

In the obiter of her concurring opinion, Supreme Court President Dorit Beinisch addressed assertions that the IDF's policy on 443 was tantamount to apartheid. She warned against referring to security measures adopted to protect people travelling on roads as segregation based on improper racial or ethnic grounds, adding that the comparison between preventing Palestinian traffic along 443 and the crime of apartheid was so extreme that it shouldn't have been raised at all.

IDF commanders must weigh similar matters daily. They don't always get it right. But rest assured that they don't act capriciously, and that even sensitive military matters are subject to judicial review.

Kairos, CIDA and the NGO wars

The Tory government's decision to end taxpayer funding for political advocacy under the banner of "humanitarian aid" by church-backed groups such as Kairos and Alternatives has sparked a knock-down, drag-out fight that echoes as far as Israel.

Despite claims by officials and supporters, the evidence clearly shows that both groups have joined the anti-Israel demonization campaign – including boycotts, divestment and sanctions – as part of a broader strategy that aims to end Jewish sovereignty. Whatever good Kairos may do elsewhere, its participation in the immoral war against Israel is unacceptable.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In Israel, a similar debate is underway after revelations that millions of dollars from European governments are being channelled to support groups that promote allegations of Israeli "human rights violations" and "war crimes." These groups routinely strip away the context of terrorism, and not only the legitimacy but the necessity of Israel's responses to protect its citizens.

As a result of these revelations, legislation is being prepared in Israel to require transparency in NGO funding provided by foreign governments. Such funding violates accepted diplomatic practice, particularly between democracies, and the tight secrecy of these European decisions accentuates the breach of civil behaviour. In newspapers, on talk shows and in polls, Israelis are expressing strong criticism about the unchecked ability of externally funded non-governmental organizations (NGOs) to set biased agendas and promote false and poisonous perceptions of Israel.

This criticism is new. For many years, NGOs claiming to promote moral virtues and good deeds have been protected by a "halo effect." Virtually no one, including journalists, checked for bias or questioned their credibility. Based on little more than their noble words, influential Israel-based groups such as B'tselem and global superpowers such as Human Rights Watch (HRW), Amnesty International and Oxfam, each with multi-million dollar budgets, were largely exempt from scrutiny.

But the halo is finally fading. A more savvy public recognizes that these groups are spearheading the demonization of Israel under the façade of human rights. A series of NGO scandals, particularly at HRW, is tarnishing their image further. In May, HRW held a fundraising dinner in Saudi Arabia – where the rights of women, minorities and others are violated every day – and touted its role in demonizing Israel.

A few months later, HRW's "senior military analyst" was exposed as a Nazi memorabilia fetishist who wrote that an SS jacket is "so cool." This is the same "expert" sent by HRW's pro-Arab Middle East division to write reports alleging Israeli "war crimes." In response to this scandal, HRW founder Robert Bernstein took the unprecedented step of criticizing his own organization in an op-ed published in the New York Times.

While investigations of NGOs' political agendas are long overdue, the partisan nature of the Canadian debate on the role of NGOs and their funders is troubling. For the Tories, the changes in the CIDA budget, and particularly the decision to end taxpayer support for Kairos and Alternatives, were tied to targeting Liberal party support among Jews. Absurd attacks were launched against Liberal MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler, charging that his world-renowned leadership in fighting anti-Semitism was somehow insufficient.

On the Liberal side, some MPs and sympathetic pundits reflexively defended CIDA funding for Kairos, blindly accepting false claims of impartiality made by the group. Kairos officials denied clear evidence of wrongdoing and immorality, and revised its website in a belated and ineffective attempt to distance themselves from some of the damning details.

Similarly, in Israel, ideological defenders of politicized NGOs and campaigns of demonization, including the New Israel Fund, sought to discredit and block public debate by charging critics with "McCarthyism" and attempts to "stifle free speech." After enjoying the privileged position of critics, they didn't know how to respond when criticized.

In both Israel and Canada, the NGO wars are far from over. But as the debates continue, it's clear that a small group of NGO officials, empowered by a few wealthy donors, will no longer avoid accountability when they twist moral principles beyond recognition.

The Kirshner File

Obama's overtures to Iran have been rebuffed

A year ago in January, shortly before his inauguration as the first African-American president of the United States, Barack Obama broke with his predecessor, George W. Bush, and announced he would pursue a policy of "engagement" with Iran so as to improve bilateral relations and halt Iran's budding nuclear program. As he put it, "We are going to have to take a new approach. My belief is that engagement is the place to start."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

During the next few months, Obama fleshed out his position, saying he was "committed to diplomacy that addresses the full range of issues before us" and "direct dialogue."

In a further signal to Iran, Obama, in a speech in Turkey, declared that the United States "is not and will never be at war with Islam."

But even as Obama went out on a limb to strike a positive tone, Iran rebuffed Obama, stating it will not suspend uranium enrichment, the nub of the problem.

As if to rub it in, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad asserted that Iran would not cooperate unless there are "profound changes" in U.S. foreign policy: an end to support for Israel, a withdrawal of American forces from Iraq and Afghanistan, and an apology from Washington for meddling in Iranian affairs in the past.

In light of Iran's provocative response to Obama's overtures, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton has expressed doubt whether Iran is really interested in turning a new page. "We're under no illusions," she commented recently. "Our eyes are wide open on Iran."

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

Israel's defence minister, Ehud Barak, has been even blunter, observing that the chances of thwarting Iran's nuclear ambitions through negotiations are "very low."

Despite Iran's truculence, and the news that it has built a secret enrichment plant in Qum, the United States and the other permanent members of the United Nations' Security Council – Russia, China, France and Britain – engaged Iran in talks in Geneva last October. In what appeared to be a significant shift, Iranian negotiators consented to ship three-quarters of Iran's known stockpile of nuclear fuel to Russia and France for conversion into a form that could only be used for peaceful means in the production of electricity and medical isotopes.

The draft agreement, which seemed like a breakthrough, served two interlocking purposes – delaying Iran's ability to produce a nuclear weapon for about a year and thus buying time for a broader and more comprehensive solution to the impasse, and pushing back Israel's veiled threat to bomb Iranian nuclear sites.

Washington gave Iran an informal deadline of Dec. 31, 2009, to negotiate seriously and co-operate fully with the International Atomic Energy Agency, with Obama saying he was "not interested in talking for the sake of talking" and Clinton urging Iran to take "constructive actions."

To no one's surprise, Iran's divided leadership has not ratified the deal reached in Switzerland.

It is therefore a dead letter.

Within weeks of the Geneva talks, Iran let it be known that it had no legs to stand on.

On a trip to Istanbul to bolster relations with Turkey, Ahmadinejad said that Iran would not stop its nuclear program while its arch rival, Israel, was in possession of an atomic arsenal.

In another unmistakable sign that Iran had reneged, Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said that Tehran would not transport its low-enriched uranium out of the country, but would consider "a simultaneous swap" in which it would give up some of its stockpile after receiving more highly enriched fuel.

Mottaki's suggestion was, at best, disingenuous, since the whole point of the Geneva exercise was to bring Iran's stockpile below the level required to manufacture nuclear weapons.

Iran continues to insist that its nuclear program is not military-oriented. But the United States, like Israel, is skeptical.

Indeed, the Obama administration no longer believes that Iran ever ceased work on its nuclear program in 2003, as a controversial U.S. intelligence report released in 2007 strongly suggested. For the record, intelligence agencies in Germany, France, Britain and Israel rejected this rosy appraisal from the start.

Iran's lack of good faith has also been noted by the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Barack Obama

Last November, after it was already clear that Iran had no intention of co-operating meaningfully with the United Nations, the outgoing director general of the nuclear watchdog organization, Mohamed El Baradei, acknowledged that Tehran had stonewalled inspectors regarding nuclear weapons design programs, and that his efforts to ascertain the truth had effectively reached "a dead-end."

El Baradei's admission, which was definitely not in keeping with his previous sanguine assessments of Iran's intentions, have raised concerns that Iran may have already built secret nuclear facilities, and is now working on testing a neutron initiator, a key final component of a nuclear device.

Of late, senior Iranian officials have given credence to the growing view that Iran is absolutely determined to go through with its enrichment program.

Ali Larijani, the speaker of Iran's parliament and a prodigy of Iran's spiritual leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, warned that Iran's co-operation with the International Atomic Energy Agency could "seriously decrease" in the near future, and that Iran may pull out of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, which governs the world's use of nuclear power. (Israel is not a signatory to that treaty.)

Ramping up the rhetoric, Ahmadinejad fired off three inflammatory statements, saying that Iran is not obligated to inform the UN about its plans to build nuclear sites, threatening to produce higher-enriched uranium, and dismissing the Obama administration's deadline to accept the UN-drafted deal crafted in Geneva.

Mohamed El Baradei

In an additional demonstration of defiance, Iran tested the solid-fuel Sejil-2 missile – which can reach Israel – and staged war games.

Both well publicized exercises were presumably designed to discourage Israel and the United States from launching attacks on its nuclear infrastructure.

On Jan. 2, the Iranian foreign minister took Iran's defiance to a more menacing level, warning that the UN had one month to respond to his counter-proposal.

On Dec. 25, he suggested that Turkey or Iran could be the venue for exchanging nuclear material. The UN, spearheaded by the United States, has ignored this self-serving offer, which would gut the Geneva agreement.

Facing familiar Iranian recalcitrance, the United States is calling for a fourth set of economic sanctions to be imposed on Iran. "We have already begun discussions with our partners and with like-minded nations about pressure and sanctions," said Clinton, speaking shortly after the U.S. House of Representatives voted to slap sanctions on Iran.

According to Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon, Iran will be hit with fresh UN sanctions in February.

Since previous UN sanctions have not had an effect on Iran, Israel has called for "crippling sanctions" that might actually work.

But it is questionable whether the UN will go that far. Neither Russia nor China are keen about sanctions, publicly regarding them as counter-productive and privately fearing that they will jeopardize their thriving commercial relationship with Iran.

Moscow's mindset is such that Russian Prime Minister Vladimir Putin has been quoted as claiming he has no evidence that Iran is trying to build a nuclear weapon.

What sanctions Russia and China have supported were always watered down, leaving Iran free to pursue its nuclear objectives.

The debate over sanctions may be academic. On Jan. 10, Ahmadinejad said that sanctions will not deter Iran from pursuing a nuclear program.

Iranian exile predicts end of current regime

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Iran's Islamic leadership will fall by the end of this year if the country continues to be rocked by further political turmoil, claims an exiled Iranian academic currently visiting Israel for the first time.

Mahmood Karimi-Hakak

Mahmood Karimi-Hakak, a 60-year-old Muslim who holds dual Iranian and American citizenship and last visited Iran in 2007, arrived in Israel as a Fulbright scholar last month at the invitation of Tel Aviv University.

He plans to remain in Israel for the next five months, teaching theatre and social studies at Tel Aviv University and working with Israelis and Palestinians on stage productions.

Two weeks ago, Karimi-Hakak – a professor of creative arts at Siena College in Albany, N.Y. – delivered a lecture at Haifa University in which he is reported to have said, "If the situation [in Iran] remains as it is today, by the end of 2010, the regime in Iran will be replaced."

Iran, governed by hard-line Islamists since the downfall of the pro-western Pahlavi monarchy in 1979, has been convulsed by street violence since last June's disputed general election.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who was first elected in 2005, claimed victory, but his opponents in the Green Movement cried foul, saying the election was rigged.

"He stole the election," declared Karimi-Hakak in a telephone interview from Israel.

Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, sided with Ahmadenijad, who has repeatedly called for Israel's destruction, denied the Holocaust and fended off western demands to halt its militarized nuclear program.

Certain that the election was a blatant exercise in fraud, Iranian protesters took to the streets in nationwide demonstrations, calling for fresh elections and reforms. The protests have been met by a harsh response from the government.

Karimi-Hakak describes the Iranian regime as dictatorial and theocratic and believes that non-violent demonstrators acting on behalf of the opposition Green Movement – which seeks evolutionary rather than revolutionary changes – can bring it to its knees before year's end.

"This regime has to go," he said.

By his estimate, demonstrators are capable of dislodging the powers-that-be in Iran – namely Khamenei and Ahmadinejad, as well as the Revolutionary Guards that support them.

"The Iranian regime has already cracked from within," he claimed. "A great part of the army, Revolutionary Guards and the clergy have already shown signs of support for the Green Movement."

But he warned that western intervention in Iran, in the form of an Israeli or U.S. strike on its underground nuclear facilities, would be counter-productive and strengthen the forces of repression.

As he put it at Haifa University, "An Israeli attack would only unite the Iranian people and enable the government to blame a 'foreign enemy' for Iran's mismanagement problems, so I implore you not to intervene."

Karimi-Hakak cited a precedent to buttress his belief that external threats prompt Iranians to rally around their government. In 1980, Iraq invaded Iran, touching off a protracted war that caused hundreds of thousands of casualties and united Iranians.

"Ahmadinejad wants a war so that he can consolidate his hold on power and destroy the opposition," he said. "I am convinced that the heads of the government in Iran pray every day for an Israeli attack that would reunite the people against an external enemy."

In his judgment, a new Iranian government would realign Iran's foreign policy. "It would have friendly relations with all countries in the Middle East, including Israel, and all the great powers."

It would also cancel Iran's military-oriented nuclear program which, he said, isn't needed. But Iran, he added, has a right to peaceful nuclear energy.

Karimi-Hakak claims that the majority of Iranians aren't anti-Israel and would welcome a resumption of Iran's diplomatic relations with the Jewish state. Iran severed ties with Israel in 1979, shortly after Mohammed Reza Pahlavi, the Shah, was forced into exile.

Nor do most Iranians buy into Ahmadinejad's claim that the Holocaust is a hoax. "They categorically do not believe that," he said.

No supporter of the Shah, Karimi-Hakak supported the Islamic revolution on the grounds that it would usher in a period of a democracy.

CJC, United Church ties remain strained

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The relationship between Canadian Jewish Congress and the United Church of Canada remains strained even after a church spokesperson further distanced the Protestant body from a Jewish anti-Zionist organization and said it would meet with Congress to discuss their differences.

Bernie Farber

Last week, United Church spokesman Bruce Gregersen said a letter to Congress would be sent this week responding to Congress' request for a meeting.

He acknowledged that providing a $900 grant to Independent Jewish Voices (IJV) was a mistake and that the church regretted doing it. "IJV is not an organization that we [the national church] choose to partner with for any future activity," he said.

Congress CEO Bernie Farber did not appear satisfied with that response. He said, "it shouldn't take two months to say let's get together," referring to Congress' letter outlining its concerns and requesting a meeting. In addition, a statement distancing the United Church from IJV "was never made by the [church's] moderator. It should have been done before.

Congress concerned over grant to Independent Jewish Voices

"They need to put forward a policy by the national body. If they do that, it would be a huge step forward."

Last summer, as the United Church met at its national conference, reports revealed it had provided IJV with a startup grant. IJV is harshly critical of Israel, and one of its latest postings on its website, an article from Israel by Nurit Peled Elhanan "is similar to the racist garbage we had to put up with in the 1980s and '90s by [Holocaust denier] Ernst Zundel, that Israel is evil, malevolent and conspiratorial," Farber said.

The United Church, he said, continued to link to IJV's website even after pronouncing its regret about funding it. In addition, the United Church co-sponsored with IJV a speaking engagement by an anti-Zionist lecturer.

Farber said "despite our being faith partners with [the United Church] and others for 30 years, there is I suppose an expectation we have that we will not make common cause with groups that disparage our partner groups, that are hostile to the mainstream of each other's communities and gives them neither comfort nor support.

"Despite that, the [United Church] continues to have a relationship that is antithetical to the Jewish community... No one should be under the illusion that the relationship with IJV is without serious consequences."

Farber said that in early November, Congress president Mark Freiman sent a letter to the moderator of the United Church asking for a meeting. "We've received no substantial response.

"We wanted to talk as friends and partners do and to this day we have been ignored."

Asked about the United Church publicizing IJV views, Gregersen said the national church doesn't have the power to instruct regional bodies and committees to stop Internet links to IJV.

As for the national church, Gregersen said its position is that "the IJV is not an organization that we choose to partner with for any further activity."

He said the United Church had previously responded by e-mail to Congress. "We sent Bernie Farber a message that [church general secretary] Nora Saunders was out of the country and we'll respond when she returns," Farber said he never received that message.

Gregersen said the United Church had granted Congress a privileged position at last summer's national conference, giving it the right to address the assembly as honoured visitors.

"From our perspective, the relationship with Congress is still a valued relationship. We know it has been strained for various reasons... We'd be prepared to talk about it."

For its part, the United Church has its own concerns including Congress' reaction to the labeling of Kairos, an ecumenical church group, as anti-Semitic.

Gregersen suggested the United Church and Congress should "find something to do that is positive and gives us common ground and is a shared activity." He suggested joint projects promoting "ecological justice."

But Farber said that the two groups would not be "getting together until the issue is resolved."

B'nai Brith Canada defends policies

B'nai Brith states that members of CMOBBC complained to a BBI court about alleged irregularities that led to adoption of a new constitution, but the court ruled that the amended constitution was duly passed and was valid. Furthermore, the defence notes, the court required all parties to the appeal to remain silent about the case.

The statement of defence alleges that the CMOBBC nevertheless subsequently circulated e-mails containing allegations of wrongdoing about B'nai Brith, and despite a "cease and desist notice," the CMOBBC continued to circulate material about the organization and its leadership.

In November 2007, B'nai Brith's executive committee filed a complaint to the group's internal disciplinary committee against 21 BBC members who were alleged to be involved with the CMOBBC, and charged that their behaviour "was contrary to the BBC Code of Behaviour and the best interests of the BBC so as to merit expulsion for conduct unbecoming a member of BBC."

The defence asserts that the hearing was conducted fairly and that Joe Bogoroch, the chair of the executive committee, "was available to answer any question which the appellants wished to pose. At no time during the hearing or subsequently did the alleged CMOBBC members or [their lawyer] direct questions to Mr. Bogoroch or ask to cross-examine him."

The defence also claims that the members facing expulsion declined to call witnesses when prompted, were permitted to make statements but deferred to their lawyer, and were allowed to provide the evidence they chose.

Lawyer Rochelle Cantor, who represents the expelled members, said the next step in the case will likely be examination for discovery, in which B'nai Brith representatives are questioned and their replies become part of the court record.

Toronto writer wins book award

JTA

Toronto author Joseph Kertes has won the 59th annual National Jewish Book Award for fiction for his novel Gratitude.

Kertes' Holocaust-themed novel, which was first published in Canada in 2008, is one of 18 books in various categories recognized by the awards overseen by the Jewish Book Council in New York City.

The book is set in German-occupied Hungary during the final months of World War II. Kertes, a native of Hungary, escaped with his family to Canada after the 1956 revolution.

Other National Jewish Book Award winners include Hasia Diner, author of We Remember with Reverence and Love: American Jews and the Myth of Silence after the Holocaust, 1945-1962 (New York University Press), the American Jewish Studies' Celebrate 350 Award; Melvin Urofsky, the Everett Family Foundation Jewish Book of the Year Award for Louis D. Brandeis: A Life (Pantheon Books), and Daniel Gordis, for Saving Israel: How the Jewish People Can Win a War That May Never End (John Wiley & Sons), the Contemporary Jewish Life and Practice Award.

Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, chief rabbi of England, won the Dorot Foundation Award in memory of Joy Ungerleider Mayerson in Modern Jewish Thought & Experience for his Covenant & Conversation: A Weekly Reading of the Jewish Bible, Genesis: The Beginnings (Koren Publishers). The winners will be honored March 9 in New York City.

'Security and health [override] all other considerations'

Rabbi Bulka agrees that full-body scans may not be the most effective security measure. "There are people in Israel who have said... what you need is a full body check – you have to be able to have access to every single part of the body, including those we would consider off limits. So what do you do then?"

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler

In that case, he says, the government has a responsibility to ensure that "a woman has the right to request that she be searched by another woman, and the same thing for a man."

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler of Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Congregation says that "the paradigm of forbidden or permitted is probably the wrong paradigm. Technology is innocuous; it's how it's utilized that's the issue." He cites the examples of computers or cars: "The automobile isn't prohibited, [but] used improperly it can be a tool for death.

"There's an entire section of Talmud devoted to laws of privacy [the first chapter of tractate Bava Batra]," Rabbi Strauchler says. "Our tradition requires societies to build fences to prevent people from looking in on one another.

"Likewise, security is the greatest value when it comes to halachic decision-making: security and health [override] all other considerations save three."

So the only question for Rabbi Strauchler is the specific technology – "how it's employed to assure the best possible security, but at the same time doesn't compromise a person's privacy."

That might involve "finding ways to set up [security] people in locations where they would not see the person that's being scanned," not saving the files and images from the scans. "The system as a whole needs to be created in a way that prevents abuse.

"Halachah always has something to say," Rabbi Strauchler says, but he also believes the controversy of full-body scans should highlight an important personal issue, given the modern proliferation of information on the Internet and in other media – not all of it appropriate. "Each of us needs to think about what should we see, what should we not see, and decide the ways in which we expose ourselves or we don't."

Academic doubts broad economic sanctions against Iran will work

"The first constitution after 1979 was extremely democratic. But in the past 20 years, Iran has shifted away from democracy," said Karimi-Hakak, an advocate of representative government.

He immigrated to the United States in 1976 to continue his studies in theatre. Returning in 1992, he lived in Iran until 1999. He left yet again after coming under investigation for a Shakespeare play he had produced without official approval.

He doubts whether broad economic sanctions will work against Iran, saying that previous United Nations sanctions have bolstered Iran's leadership while hurting ordinary Iranians. He calls for sanctions that will limit the international mobility of Iran's leaders and freeze their overseas bank accounts.

After a month in Israel, he has reached the conclusion that it's a very complex, democratic country whose Arab minority isn't necessarily treated equally.

"The people I have met in Israel are wonderful and very friendly," he observed. "They desire peace and tranquility." But he's not convinced that the present Israeli government is in touch with their feelings and acts on their desires.

He admits he was hesitant to visit Israel. "I thought about it for a year, but I went because one should face the 'enemy' and carry on a dialogue with such people."

In fact, Karimi-Hakak doesn't regard Israel or Israelis as enemies.

"I don't think anyone is our enemy. It is governments that perpetuate animosity between countries. This animosity is not shared by Israelis and Iranians, who have lived in brotherhood."

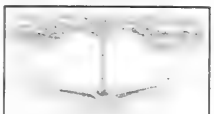
Catching up quickly

By RABBI AVROHOM JACKS

A scientist and a philosopher were being chased by a hungry lion.

The scientist made some quick calculations and concluded that "it's no good trying to outrun the beast, because it will catch up to us."

The philosopher kept running a little ahead of the scientist and replied, "I'm not trying to outrun the lion. I'm merely trying to outrun you!"



Rabbinic Reflections

Judaism offers a hopeful message to anyone who has failed. The Torah teaches that we don't have to obsess about a negative past. We can indeed outrun a harmful past. We can make up ground lost to bad judgment and actually use a destructive experience to end up ahead.

This is accomplished through the transformational power of tshuvah (repentance). Tshuvah not only rectifies the past, it converts a negative sin into a positive mitzvah.

In this week's Torah portion, God tells Moses and Aaron how to calculate the Jewish calendar. The Jewish calendar is lunar-based, which means that unlike the secular calendar, which is based on the movement of the sun, its months are based on the waxing and waning of the moon.

A lunar month is about 29 days long and a solar month is approximately 30 days long. This means that over the span of a secular year, the Jewish calendar loses about 11 days against the secular calendar. Roughly every two or three years, we include a Jewish leap year in our calendar.

During a leap year, an extra month is added to the year. This not only catches up the days that are lost, it actually overcompensates so that the Jewish calendar ends up a few days ahead of the solar year.

The leap year then serves as a reminder that everyone has an opportunity from time to time to make up for what he or she has failed to accomplish in the past. Furthermore, just as the leap year not only makes up for the deficiency and also provides an advance on the future, a Jew must also intensify his efforts in the service of his creator and store up additional merits in the process.

A story is told of how the famous Rabbi Levi Yitzchok of Barditchev once grabbed a very strong, errant Jew by his lapels. This Jew was a muscular chap – not the type of person that you would want to start up with.

The rabbi was an elderly, physically feeble person. Nevertheless, he was able to shake the larger, stronger man. While the frail rabbi shook the strapping man, he told him that he was jealous of the notorious sinner.

"Why would you be jealous of me, rebbe?" the man asked. "I am just an sinful Jew. You are a spiritual giant."

The rabbi explained that if the man would repent, not only would his past be undone, he would also transform his sins into merits. This would give the man so many merits that he would have more than the rabbi had accumulated over his lifetime.

When we reflect on the difference between the Jewish and secular years, and how the leap year not only catches us up but allows us to overtake the solar year, we should realize the powerful message for our own lives. It's never too late to not only salvage our past, but even to transform it into something completely different.

This gift of tshuvah is one of Judaism's most precious gift to mankind.

Rabbi Avrohom Jacks is the spiritual leader of Congregation Zichron Kedoshim in Montreal.

Warfare must be abolished

As we stand on the threshold of the new year, the quest for universal peace seems as unrealizable as ever. North Korea's nuclear program and Iran's refusal to stop enriching uranium – potentially to manufacture nuclear weapons – highlights the fact that the world is now on the precipice of a new and dangerous nuclear era. Most alarmingly, the likelihood that fanatical terrorists will get their hands on nuclear weaponry is increasing.

Bookmarks
Bernard Baskin

When Robert Hutchins supervised the development of the atomic bomb at the University of Chicago 67 years ago, he called it "the good news of damnation," contending that it would frighten people into banding together to avoid world suicide and achieve world peace.

Now, years later, we can see he was as wrong as Alfred Nobel, a half-century earlier, who predicted that his invention of dynamite would make war so horrible that men would voluntarily give it up.

Nuclear warfare has made effective defence impossible; only retaliation remains as a threat. And even that is dubious: enemy submarines can lob nuclear bombs upon our coastal cities and submerge them into the sea. Who could identify the enemy in such a covert and undeclared war? One that could be over, for all practical purposes, in 20 minutes.

Our most perilous cultural lag is equating modern warfare with wars of the past, when today it is not only quantitatively but also qualitatively a different paradigm. We are confronting an entirely unique situation in the history of mankind, and either warfare must be abolished or we will be.

Young Canadian men and women are dying in faraway places. They face terrorists who are determined, resolute and implacable, heroes to themselves willing to die to vindicate their cause. They can be killed, but there is no way to extinguish their grievances or hostility.

In his recent book Empire of Illusion: The End of Literacy and the Triumph of Spectacle, Chris Hedges, a bitter critic of his country's foreign policy, warns his fellow Americans about the costs of warfare. "We embrace the dangerous delusion that we are on a providential mission to save the rest of the world from itself, to impose our virtues – which we see as superior to all other virtues – on others, and that we have a right to do this by force. The wars of occupation in Iraq and Afghanistan are doomed to futility. We cannot afford them. The rash of home foreclosures, the mounting job losses, the collapse of banks and the financial services industry, the poverty ripping apart the working classes, our crumbling infrastructure, and the killing of Afghan and Iraqi civilians by our iron fragmentation bombs converge. The costly forms of death we dispense on one side of the globe are hollowing us out from the inside at home."

Others, of course, disagree and are certain that the terrorist threat must be eliminated if the world is to ever enjoy security.

War is waged for many different reasons. At best, it should be engaged in with regret, an admission that nothing else will do, that we have failed in reason and reconciliation. To proclaim a war as "holy" is the ultimate depth of blasphemy. Ultimately, all war is unholy desecrating what it proclaims to defend.

The late diplomat and politician David Ormsby-Gore lamented: "It would indeed be a tragedy if the history of the human race proved to be nothing more than the story of an ape playing with a box of matches on a petrol heap."

Intermarriage poses educational challenges

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

As Mark Steyn put it quite simply in his book America Alone, "experts talk about root causes. But demography is the most basic root of all." Prognostications about the future of any country, race or civilization must begin and end with the hard numbers. Is a given culture creating enough babies to reproduce their ranks? To cite one of Steyn's examples, "by 2050, 60 per cent of Italians will have no brothers, no sisters, no cousins, no aunts, no uncles. The big Italian family, with papa pouring the vino and mama spooning out the pasta down an endless table of grandparents and nieces and nephews, will be gone, no more, dead as the dinosaurs."

I had the pleasure recently of attending a series of lectures by the world's leading Jewish demographer, Sergio Della Pergola, the Argov chair of Israel-Diaspora Relations at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Among the barrage of statistics that Della Pergola mounted in his various PowerPoint presentations, two facts stood out for me. They were not at all unexpected, but they felt different when put forward in the context of statistics as opposed to anecdotal speculation.

One was the now-universal reality of interfaith marriage throughout the Jewish world. According to the latest figures, intermarriage rates are rising in every country, without exception. In the former Soviet Union, the rate is approaching 75 per cent, making Jewish intermarriage a decided anomaly. In the United States, figures are near 55 per cent, in England, close to 40 per cent, and so on.

Whether one views this with alarm or indifference is perhaps linked to how much one privileges individual choice as opposed to the overall health of the Jewish body politic. But it cannot bode well in the long run, no matter how many times I'm bombarded with the argument that it's the non-Jewish partner who is interested in Judaism. It's tiresome to hear a self-interested romantic choice (which at least is honest) rationalized after the fact as being somehow "healthy" for the Jewish community.

The second argument that Della Pergola made is that denominational affiliations are becoming increasingly feeble as ways of measuring the complexity of people's actual religious identity. In one particularly telling survey, Israelis who self-identified as chiloni (ostensibly secular) asserted the next minute that of course they kept kosher, looking puzzled as to why this might pose a contradiction. The variety of nuanced ways in which Jews now manifest their religious observance and understandings of Torah places interesting demands on the next wave in Jewish education, challenging educators and synagogue-goers to reach beyond the sterile cliches of denominational markers toward a truer and more holistic grasp of the student in front of them or the congregant behind them.

At the age of 13, when virtually all Jewish males become initiated into Jewish adulthood, the future prime minister of Britain, Benjamin Disraeli, was baptized as a Christian. Never quite losing his Jewish identity yet obviously carrying it with profound ambivalence, Disraeli is reported to have said that "history is made by those who show up." One might add that this is as true of Judaism as it is of politics.

The greening of Tu b'Shvat

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

If ever there was a Jewish holiday that was way ahead of its time, it must be Tu b'Shvat. Journalist Aaron Howard writes: "Never mentioned in Tanach, Tu b'Shvat [the 15th day of the Hebrew month of Shvat corresponding to Jan. 30 this year] was once simply the yearly date for reckoning the age of trees. In modern times, the holiday has become a Jewish Arbor Day marked by the planting of trees and a Jewish environmental holiday marked by wrestling with issues such as global warming and sustainable living." [bit.ly/shevat01]

Here's how you can learn more about Tu b'Shvat and its relevance to the world around us.

• Study what Jewish tradition has to say about the environment. Prof. Richard Schwartz quotes several rulings from the Talmud that deal with what he calls the "sacred environment," including this midrash, which he suggests has become all too relevant: "In the hour when the Holy one… created the first person, He showed him the trees in the Garden of Eden and said to him: 'See My works, how fine they are; now all that I have created, I created for your benefit. Think upon this and do not corrupt and destroy My world, for if you destroy it, there is no one to restore it after you.'" [bit.ly/ shevat02] Patterned along a traditional page of Talmud, the Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism has created the Tu b'Shvat Living Talmud with both classic and contemporary quotes. [bit.ly/shevat04]

• Join a Jewish environmental organization. COEJL, the Coalition on the Environment and Jewish Life, has assembled an impressive list of two dozen Jewish organizations that are active with environmental issues. They include the EcoKosher Network, which promotes "awareness that the foods we eat have an impact on our health and the health of our communities and environment" and Torah Trek, whose "programs explore the connection between inner and outer geography, between the journey into the wilderness and the heartpath of the soul." [bit.ly/shevat13]

I came across plenty of tips for hosting seders with an environmental twist such as one from hazon.org [bit.ly/shevat06] And it's heartening to see Jewish environmentalists are not too earnest to indulge in a pun, as Barbara Lerman-Golomb does with her article titled "Tu b'Shwatt: Serving up energy action at the seder." [bit.ly/shevat07]

Rabbi Yossi Ives poses an interesting question: "We may… ask why Judaism, which comes with first-class environmental credentials, appears in many instances to be lagging behind in ecological consciousness." He says that in the minds of many people, environmentalism has been hijacked by "eco-fascists" and that animal welfare has been "discredited in the eyes of many Jews for its hostility to shchitah… But these objections, while correct in my view, don't delegitimize the fundamental morality of environmental responsibility and compassion towards animals respectively." Some solutions: "Rabbis can raise the issue in sermons, communal organization could adopt environmentally friendly policies, Jewish charities can invest ethically and individual Jews can buy with a social and ecological conscience." [bit.ly/shevat08]

For Tova Birnbaum, Tu b'Shvat evokes memories of simpler times. "When I was growing up, Tu b'Shvat was a day I looked forward to, if for no other reason than that it meant snack bags of exotic fruits like carob and figs… As I got older, those school-issued bags of fruit disappeared, taking my observance of Tu b'Shvat with them… It's a strange irony that a day that celebrates nature and the lovely world God created should be so prominent in childhood and so overlooked in our older years… So I think it's time for the adults to take back Tu b'Shvat." [bit.ly/shevat11]

Tova is in good company.

Conversion centralization promotes unity, not disunity

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

There is great irony regarding last week's CJN editorial ("The nightmare risk of schism," Jan. 14) in light of the Perspectives piece by Rabbi Marc D. Angel in the same issue on the opposite page ("Return conversion to local rabbis")

The editorial calls for Jewish unity, but Rabbi Angel calls for disunity.

But the editorial's call for unity has been responded to already in the development in North America of the regional beit din system of the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA). The oft-repeated canard that this system was created as a reaction to the demands of the haredi Chief Rabbinate in Israel is simply wrong.

I was a member of the committee that developed this centralized system. It was a response to the anarchy that existed in North American conversions. North American rabbis were frustrated by the wide range of conversion standards among Orthodox rabbis. And, just as the editorial called for unity, the rabbinic organization also responded with a call for unity. It developed a transparent, organized, professional system for conversions. The protocols are outlined on the RCA's website at rabbis.org.

The Beth Din of America, which supervises this system, is in contact with the Israeli Chief Rabbinate's office and has had and continues to develop open dialogue with that office concerning conversion. The chief rabbi meets regularly with RCA representatives to maintain this dialogue. Situations may occasionally come up with the Israeli rabbinate, but with this open communication, these issues can be dealt with.

What Rabbi Angel objects to is that the standards of this beit din system are too stringent and that they preclude rabbinic autonomy. He has a right to that opinion.

But whenever there is centralization, there will be limits. The Food and Drug Administration in the United States only approves certain drugs. Some doctors may want to use drugs that were rejected. If we prefer autonomy, we would let them prescribe them. If we prefer the benefits of a central authority, we would not. The RCA chose – after much deliberation at the committee level, after soliciting input from the membership and from our modern Orthodox rabbinic leadership, and after approval of its executive – to implement a centralized system. We feel it is a vote for unity.

Rabbi Angel wants rabbis to have the autonomy to do conversions in which candidates aren't required to keep Shabbat and all the mitzvot. But there is a severe price to pay for that autonomy. For just as he calls for autonomy of rabbis to do conversions according to their own standards, he must also affirm other rabbis' autonomy to reject those conversions if they feel they don't meet halachic criteria. So the autonomy to do lenient conversions will be met with the autonomy to reject them. I don't think this is good for the Jews.

I don't deny there are issues that must be dealt with in the area of conversion, and that these issues have arisen as a result of a changing Jewish world. The North American Orthodox world has had enormous success with the quality of its education system and in the numbers of deeply committed Orthodox Jews. As well, the haredi community, both in Israel and North America, has also enjoyed tremendous success in its commitment to education and a haredi way of life. The number of people in the haredi community is growing rapidly.

The haredi approach is different than the modern Orthodox one. How to manage that and how to manage the toxic mix of power and religion in Israel is thorny. However, our tolerance of religious views should not be reserved only for those on the left. It needs to be exercised with respect for those on the right as well.

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks

Tolerance of haredi positions seems to have disappeared, and all civil discourse seems to have disappeared with it. The language and views that are tolerated in venomous attacks on haredi positions would never be tolerated toward any other Jewish group. This pains me greatly.

So I think the CJN editorial's call for unity has already been heard and responded to. And I think Rabbi Angel's position is a radical call for disunity.

But having said all that, as much as I feel that unity is a wonderful thing to pursue, there are far bigger challenges to the future of the Jewish People, as our members are disappearing through apathy and abysmal Jewish illiteracy.

How about a call from the heart about that?

Writing contest launched

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

B'nai Brith Canada's Don Mills Lodge is sponsoring a writing contest for Jewish high school students in the GTA who have completed at least 40 hours of community service.

The lodge will award $250 each to four students "whose essays best exemplify the authors' personal involvement, commitment, and inspiration" in performing required community service hours.

Lodge president Ava Brodsky told The CJN that part of the motivation in organizing the contest was to encourage students to express in writing what their experiences were, and to continue to volunteer even when they're no longer obligated to do so.

Essays will be judged by 10 lodge members who are former teachers or have been involved in writing, Brodsky said.

The 52-year-old lodge, a co-ed group with 120 members, has been involved in many community service efforts as part of the larger service organization.

Among them, members are actively seeking both food and monetary donations to the Kosher Food Bank at Pride of Israel Synagogue, which serves 120 families a week. They also speak to other groups about the need for a kosher food bank.

As well, they have donated money to Lilah's Fund, which supports research on neuroblastoma, a cancer of the nervous system which is one of the most common cancers in young children.

The lodge's newest project, the writing contest, was made possible through its bingo fundraisers.

Student essays should be between 350 and 500 words, and must show insight into the community service process and its impact on the student.

Entries must include the student's name, address, phone number and age, as well as his or her school's name, address and phone number.

The lodge will accept essays from Feb. 1 to Apr. 30 at donmillslodge@yahoo.ca.

Complete information about the contest can be found by going to donmillslodge.com, and downloading the PDF file of the January 2010 Planet lodge newsletter.

Blind artisan makes pianos sing

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Ari Isaac sees his blindness as an afterthought.

It hasn't stopped him from water-skiing, it hasn't stopped him from tuning pianos and it hasn't stopped him from becoming the only Canadian artisan to handcraft piano hammers and bass strings.

"When you ask... about special difficulties... I have to laugh, because I don't look at [my blindness] like that," he said in his Toronto home. "I don't think about it."

Isaac always had poor sight due to glaucoma, but at 18 years old, around the time he moved to Canada, Isaac lost his sight completely.

"When I first became blind, of course it's difficult... If you're going to overcome it, it takes awhile. I decided I'm not going to let it stand in my way," he said. "The world stops if you let it. I don't let it."

At work, Isaac relies on his sense of touch and his hearing.

"In my head, I view the world from a visual side. When I look at you, I can't see you, but I know how tall you are from the way you walk. I can tell if a person is slim or fat, skinny or short."

Isaac feels his way through his home-based workshop, weaving around wooden desks, metal machines and dozens of bass strings. Eventually, he stops at a small desk in the back, where he keeps a roll of sheep wool, the best kind of material to use when covering piano hammers.

"It's springy... I looked for something that had spring in it," he said, adding that the more flexible a piano hammer is, the richer the sound it will produce.

"Most hammers cannot flex, I've always made hammers that can. It changes... the intensity of playing."

Any music drifting through Isaac's house will probably come from his CD player. Isaac, who was born into a musical family, stopped playing piano in his youth. But he never stopped enjoying it.

"I grew up immersed in classical music. By the time I started tuning, I had a really good idea what musical tone is about," he said.

In his late teens, his family encouraged him to apprentice in piano technology, which includes piano tuning and rebuilding.

This was where he learned the anatomy of a piano.

"At the time, in Israel, when we needed parts, we couldn't get them abroad," he said. This meant that the parts were made virtually by hand.

After moving to Canada and continuing this work, Isaac noticed that most piano parts, like hammers, were imported internationally from factories, rather than handcrafted by skilled artisans.

"Eventually, I started rebuilding pianos. You put new strings on pianos, put new hammers in. I noticed [that] the hammers that I was buying, I couldn't get them to do what I wanted, no matter what I did," he said. "I decided I wanted to make my own bass strings and hammers. Those are the two parts that really make a difference."

When a piano's hammer hits the string, it stops the string from vibrating, thereby "killing" part of the note, Isaac said. This creates a tinny sound. By using flexible materials to make the hammers, he can create longer, richer notes.

As one of only a handful of artisans who makes bass strings and piano hammers in North America, Isaac has worked for many famous musicians, including concert pianist Sally Christia and jazz pianist Delbert Bump, as well as on comedian Robin Williams' piano.

But for Isaac, his job isn't about celebrities.

"I wanted to contribute something to the world of music," he said.

When asked what special difficulties a blind piano technologist may face, Isaac pauses for a second, thinking. Finally, he has an answer.

"Not being able to fly a plane," he said.

For more information about Isaac, visit www.isaacpiano.com.

Things you didn't hear about Galloway's Gaza stunt

Even a few years ago, radical British MP George Galloway's PR stunt earlier this month to pressure Cairo into allowing his pro-Palestinian "aid" convoy into Gaza at the Rafah crossing would likely have received substantial media coverage.

Now, however, world attention is focused on the aftermath of the Christmas Day airplane bomb attempt, including Al Qaeda's and Yemen's roles – basically, there's been a re-focus on Islamist terrorism. Consequently, the media gave scant notice to Galloway, other than to report that he ran afoul of Egyptian authorities and was sent packing back to Britain.

Still, this episode revealed much about Egypt and Gaza – and in particular, about Hamas.

First the background: the group Galloway headed, called "Viva Palestina," consisted of about 500 activists, mostly British and American. They had gathered in Egypt for a week in late December to protest the "siege" of Gaza, prior to their intended trip there to mark the anniversary of the Gaza war.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

However, during the night of Jan. 5, in the northern Sinai town of El Arish, they clashed with Egyptian security forces over the route the convoy was to take, leaving many injured on both sides. (In a separate incident at Rafah, an Egyptian soldier was killed and more than a dozen others were injured, and four Palestinians were wounded, in a gun battle during a Hamas-organized protest against an anti-smuggling wall that Cairo is building on the border.)

AFP reported ("Egypt bars Gaza-bound aid convoys," Jan. 9) that in response to the El Arish clash, Egyptian foreign minister Ahmed Abul Gheit declared that Galloway had committed "criminal" acts on Egyptian soil. Gheit told Al Ahram: "Egypt will no longer allow convoys, regardless of their origin or who is organizing them, from crossing its territory." Galloway was expelled from the country.

AFP added that "Egypt accused Galloway, who once called at a London rally for the overthrow of Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, of trying to embarrass the country, which has refused to permanently open its Rafah border crossing with Gaza."

What went unreported was the broader significance of Galloway's Egyptian escapade.

Two developments stand out: first, Egypt's angry response to Galloway's, and Hamas', challenge to open the Rafah crossing to his convoy (Egypt wanted the trucks to go through Israel's southern crossing) underscores the degree to which Cairo wants to keep the onus on Israel as the party responsible for humanitarian aid to the Palestinians in Gaza – a point made explicit by the Egyptian foreign ministry's labelling of Israel as the "occupying force."

Keeping the Rafah crossing mostly sealed not only keeps the international focus on Israel, it also hinders ties between Hamas and the banned Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, a movement from which Hamas arose and which threatens Mubarak's regime.

Second, as Amira Hass explained ("Pro-Gaza activists under siege – imposed by Egypt and Hamas," Ha'aretz, Jan. 8), Hamas so tightly controlled the small number of activists who did manage to enter Gaza that they apparently were left bewildered and frustrated.

For instance, claiming "security reasons," Hamas prevented the activists from lodging in the homes of ordinary Gazans (as some NGO's had arranged), forcing them to stay in a hotel – owned by Hamas – where they were bottled up. But Hamas officials went further. They even prevented the activists who were participating in a "Break the Siege" march from speaking with Gazans.

The march itself was a controlled PR exercise for Hamas, as Hass describes: "The march turned into nothing more than a ritual… Especially photogenic were four Americans from the anti-Zionist ultra-Orthodox Jewish group Neturei Karta… There were no Palestinian women among the marchers – a slap to the many feminist organizers and participants, both women and men.

"After the march, the guests voiced protests to some of the official Palestinian organizers. 'We came to demonstrate against the siege, and we found that we ourselves were under siege,' they said.

"In meetings [that managed to be arranged] without the security men, several activists got the impression that non-Hamas residents live in fear and are afraid to speak or identify themselves by name. 'Now I understand that the call for 'Freedom for Gaza' has another meaning,' one young man told me."

Jewish community responds to crisis in Haiti

The organization is working on sending "basic supplies like water, diapers, baby bottles and pharmaceuticals" to the orphanage, which Rosensweig said is being used as a respite centre. As well, the organization plans to help to repair whatever damage the building has suffered.

As of Monday morning, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto had raised $268,500 from more than 1,600 donors, while in western Canada, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's Haiti Earthquake Relief Fund had raised more than $17,000 as of last Friday, and the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver raised more than $16,000 in the first 24 hours of launching its Haiti Earthquake Relief Fund.

"The Jewish community is deeply saddened and concerned about the tragedy in Haiti, and we are committed to continuing the long tradition of Jewish humanitarianism during times of crisis," said Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver board chair Michael Fugman in a news release.

Over and above the amount in UJA Federation's fund in Toronto, four other federations have directed a total of $40,000 to Toronto's federation to help the Israel Forum for International Humanitarian Aid (IsraAID), which has sent a 15-person search-and-rescue team from Israel to Haiti. The team is working at the site of the collapsed central hospital in Port-au-Prince, where thousands of wounded have gathered, according to a federation news release dated Sunday.

UJA Federation is sending 100 per cent of the funds it raises to IsraAID, the release stated.

The federation is IsraAID's largest organizational supporter, said federation spokesperson Howard English.

"The scope of this disaster is really beyond description," he added. "The Jewish community recognizes what a calamity this is."

In Montreal, Federation CJA has been asking members of the Jewish community to join the global effort to assist the Haitian people.

The organization expected donations to top $80,000 by the end of last Friday, and money was still coming in. "We are extremely moved by the response from the Jewish community. It's just outstanding," said Federation CJA communications director Howard Krosnick.

He also noted that employees of the shoe retailer, Aldo Group, are designating the money raised by their internal campaign to the CJA relief fund, and the corporation has promised to match dollar-for-dollar their contributions.

"There is a deep historical connection between Haitians and Jews, which includes Haiti having rendered assistance to the Jewish People during the Holocaust, and Haiti has been a long-standing friend of Israel," the federation said in an e-mailed message.

"This desperately poor country – the poorest in the Western Hemisphere – cries out for help at this critical time. We cannot but feel deep compassion for their plight, and we would be failing in our duty to come to the assistance of the vulnerable if we do not stand in solidarity with Haiti today."

The federation is working with local and international partners, including the Montreal Haitian community, to funnel help in the most effective way.

As well, a jam session was held at Montreal's student-run Ghetto Shul on Saturday night to raise funds for Haiti.

The Jewish General Hospital (JGH) in Montreal is also assisting in Haiti relief. Its foundation collected several hundred boxes of medical supplies, including medications, that were shipped on Saturday. The foundation is also raising funds among staff, volunteers and lay leaders at the hospital. External donors are being sought to match these contributions.

The hospital said it is also prepared to send interested doctors and nurses to Haiti, if the Canadian and Quebec aid agencies request this type of support.

"This tragedy has hit us close to home," said JGH executive director Dr. Hartley Stern. "Many of our staff and patients are from Haiti and have family and friends who are living there now. We are grieving with them and will show our support in any way we can."

A news release from Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's office, dated last Thursday, said that Netanyahu had ordered Israel's defence ministry, foreign ministry and public security minister officials to quickly consider how to render humanitarian assistance to Haiti following the earthquake, and that an advance IDF Home Front Command, IDF Medical Corps and Foreign Ministry delegation had left for the island. The group included engineering, medical, logistics and rescue experts.

Relatives of Sharona Elsaieh, daughter of the late peace activist Abie Nathan, said last week that she was missing. They heard from her last Friday, alive and in good condition, according to a JTA report. She had been living in Jamaica for several years.

Two other Israelis, a woman and her nine-year-old son, were also reported missing. Several other Israelis also live in Haiti.

Rabbi Shimon Pelman – a Chabad rabbi based in Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic – was on his way to Haiti last Thursday, two days after the quake, when reached on his cellphone by The CJN. He also serves the tiny Jewish community of Haiti, which numbers perhaps eight families in Port-au-Prince, the capital, about 16 kilometres from the earthquake's epicentre. He said he had not heard of any Canadian Jews being in Haiti at the time of the earthquake.

Haiti and the Dominican Republic each occupy part of the island of Hispaniola in the Caribbean. Normally, it is about a three-hour drive from Santo Domingo to Port-au-Prince, the rabbi said.

Travelling with two Dominican diplomats, and taking kosher food for Israeli relief personnel in Haiti to have for Shabbat, the rabbi was expecting members of the Dominican Jewish community to follow with more supplies. The Dominican has a Jewish population of about 350.

On an individual basis, Julian Brass, a 26-year-old Toronto-based entrepreneur, is organizing a fundraiser to help Haiti relief efforts.

The founder of NotableTV.com, a new-media company launched last March, Brass decided last week, when he saw the scope of the earthquake's destruction on television news, to "shut down normal operations" at his company for three to four days to create a "massive" fundraiser that would galvanize young professionals, as well as raise money and collect goods to send to Haiti. Details were not yet finalized when The CJN went to press Monday.

Following the earthquake, Canadian Jewish Congress' national president Mark Freiman and CEO Bernie Farber wrote to the Haitian chargé d'affaires in Ottawa to express deep sorrow and extend condolences on the extent of damage and loss of life.

The funds established by Jewish federations are "in keeping with the traditional Jewish concept of 'tikkun olam,' " Freiman and Farber wrote.

Other Jewish organizations, including B'nai Brith Canada and Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center, expressed their sympathy and support to the Haitian community.

Canadian professor gets Ottoman Bank award

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

After five years of research, reading hundreds of documents and writing 440 pages, Joseph B. Glass last month became the first Canadian to receive an award from the Ottoman Bank Archives and Research Centre last month.

Glass, along with co-author Ruth Kark, received about $10,000 (US) this past December for their book Sephardi Entrepreneurs in Jerusalem: The Valero Family 1800-1945, which explored the development of banking in Ottoman Palestine by telling the story of the Valero family, who, in 1848, developed the first private bank in what is now Israel.

The competition, which recognizes academic research on Turkish banking and economic history, was run by the Ottoman Bank Archives and Research Centre, the European Association for Banking and Financial History and the History Foundation of Turkey. The award ceremony was held in Turkey.

For Glass, who teaches Canadian studies and geography and tourism at Centennial College in Toronto, and Kark, a professor at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem in Israel, the award came as a surprise, mainly because of the timing of their submission.

"If we take the timing of how Turkey and Israel relations deteriorated a little bit [in 2008, when the entry was submitted], we thought, 'Well, maybe just because the book talks about Israel, they'll overlook it,'" Glass said. "I hope [the award] is an expression of their academic freedom."

The book itself, which took Glass and Kark about five years to write, looks at the history of Sephardi Jews in Jerusalem, a side of Israel's history that many researchers ignore, Glass said.

"There are things that, in history, they sort of get lost," he said, adding that this is often the case for the Sephardi families he's studied and written about.

"This whole group of Sephardi families were a fascinating study that had been overlooked. Usually, when it comes to history... whoever writes it, write what they want," he said.

According to Glass, the research was hindered by Israel's Labor government several decades ago, which "followed certain ideological directions when it came to Sephardi Jews."

Kark, who met Glass when he was her PhD student at Hebrew University, agrees that more research needs to be done on the subject.

"It's a topic that is neglected, especially by Jewish researchers and scholars. It is important, it has an international [importance]," she said.

When entering the competition, the authors hoped the fact that their research was unusual would be recognized.

"There was the hope that they'd pick up on the uniqueness of telling the story of a bank," Glass said. "[The judges said] they found the intermingling of social and financial history to be fascinating."

Glass and Kark originally started work on the book after being approached by the Valero family. They were given access to bank statements, personal diaries and letters that had never been published. The authors found out that the Valero family dealt with the finances of visiting royalty and that they had their own synagogue, which still exists in Jerusalem.

This book is one of several projects that she and Glass have worked on together, Kark said, adding that 20 years ago, Glass was her teaching assistant at Hebrew University.

"He learned a lot about the local things [in Israel], the local history. He was a wonderful student," she said.

"Joseph also had a wonderful character, which probably comes from Canada. He's very considerate and a very nice person, apart from being a talented scholar."

Glass, who is currently working on a new book about Canada and the Holy Land, will use his part of the award money for his research, while Kark is considering adding it to a fund she keeps for her master's and PhD students who need financial support.

In Loving Memory

ZOE ALEXANDRA NEUMANN SPRINGER ז"ל

January 10, 1985 to January 22, 2005

"FOREVER YOUNG"

It is with profound sadness that we mark the 5th anniversary of the loss of our beautiful and courageous Zoe. There are no words that can fully convey the depths of our longing for her.

Zoe's permanent absence in our lives remains unreal, even today, 5 years later. Zoe remains our shining star, forever etched in our hearts and imprinted on our souls. Zoe is deeply missed by her parents Judy and Steve, her sister Lindsay, Ari Simms, Grandma Rhoda, Aunts Robin and Andrea, Uncle Allan, John, cousins Marielle, Shauna, and Joanna, Great Aunt and Uncle Rifka and Shloime, and all the rest of our special extended family and friends.

FOREVER IN OUR HEARTS
NEVER TO BE FORGOTTEN

Zoe, we love and miss you more than words....
Mom & Dad, Lindsay & Ari

"היה או לא היה" - אירוע השנה שלנו

במאית ההפקה הטורונטאית היא יעל פינגולד, שהקימה את התיאטרון ובימה את "עיר הנפש" בשנה שעברה. מפיקת ההצגה היא תמי ברמן, מזרזת הרים מקצועית. בגלל ההיסטריה לכרטיסים בשנה שעברה, תוקיימה שתי הצגות ביום ראשון , 7 בפבריאר, 1:00 בצהריים וב-7:30 בערב

ענת האסקר מתקרבת והאולמנים מנסים לשחרר את לחיציהם הגדולים.

Up in the Air הוא סרטו המצליח מאוד של ג'ורג' קלוני, שמשחק את דמותו של נוסע מתמיד שמבלה כשלוש מאות יום בשנה על מטוסים ותפקידו הוא לפטר אנשים ממשרותיהם, במקום שמנהליהם המפחדים יעשו את העבודה הלא נעימה. חייו מתנהלים בנעם של רוחק מבוקש, עד שהוא פוגש את מי שהוא מקווה שתהיה אשת חייו, ואז מתחילות ההפתעות. סרט חכם וציני על החיים במטוסים המהיר של המילניום החדש. שמהנה במיוחד קורן.

Federal finance minister talks to Jewish high schoolers

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — High school students at Winnipeg's Gray Academy of Jewish Education were clearly eager to ask questions of Finance Minister Jim Flaherty when he spoke to them Jan. 11 at the Asper Jewish Community Campus' Berney Theatre.

In his opening remarks Flaherty said that last year was "a very rocky time," for the global economy.

But, he said, "I think we'll see improvement in 2010, and 2011 will be even better," and Canadians "can have some comfort" that an economic recovery is underway in this country.

Flaherty was in Winnipeg last week as part of pre-budget consultations. Gray Academy was the only school he visited on his trip.

He told students that the overall challenge globally is that the U.S. dollar is under a "lot of pressure due to the large U.S. deficit." He added that Ottawa is running a deficit in these difficult financial times in order to encourage employment.

He also told the teens about the upcoming conference of G7 finance ministers that Canada is hosting in Iqaluit, Nunavut, on Feb. 5 and 6.

His opening address was relatively short, as he said he wanted time to answer the students' questions, noting that it's important for him to listen to the needs of business-people, university students and young people.

The students weren't shy in querying the finance minister.

One of the first questions asked was whether Prime Minister Stephen Harper's decision "to prorogue parliament would affect the economy."

Flaherty said that it wouldn't, and that what matters is "consumer confidence," among other factors.

As well, he said, "because we won't sit, I'll be able to do more pre-budget consultation" and travel around the country listening to others' ideas.

"A lot of good ideas come from listening," he said.

Another student asked Flaherty about how the Canadian economy would be affected by the high Canadian dollar and weak U.S. dollar.

Flaherty responded that in "the short term, it's very difficult for exporters," but over the longer term, businesses can adjust. He said what concerns businesses is currency volatility. He noted that the higher Canadian dollar is a good thing for "those who want to buy more modern machinery" in order to upgrade their businesses.

When asked by a student how U.S. President Barack Obama's "Buy America" plan will affect Canada, Flaherty responded that "for elected people, it's easy to succumb to protectionist sentiment because it's popular."

After noting that Obama is under a lot of pressure, Flaherty said, "We have a NAFTA agreement with the U.S. and Mexico, and we expect compliance."

He added that protectionism is very "short-sighted" for economic well-being.

Flaherty, who noted that he has "three 18-year-old sons," spoke to the students about the need to plan for the future so that the economy will be in good shape when they graduate from university.

When asked by a student about his views on Iran, Flaherty said that the "prime minister has been very clear that we view the buildup of tools of aggression against Israel as unacceptable."

Following his address, Flaherty was given a tour of the Asper Jewish Community Campus by Bob Freedman, CEO of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, and federation president Ben Cohen.

Klimt painting restored to survivor

JANICE ARNOLD

MONTREAL — A Montreal man stands to come into millions of dollars from the sale of a restituted painting his family lost during the Holocaust, according to a British newspaper.

The Financial Times reported Jan. 8 that Georges Jorisch, 81, and the current owner of Church in Cassone by Gustav Klimt have reached a legal agreement to divide the proceeds after the masterpiece is auctioned at Sotheby's in London early next month.

Sotheby's estimates the painting will be sold for between 12 million and 18 million pounds, or about $19.9 to $29.9 million.

"I am sorry, but I cannot say anything at the moment," Los Angeles lawyer Randol Schoenberg, who has represented Jorisch, responded by e-mail to a request from The CJN for more information.

Jorisch, a retired camera store owner who has been living in Montreal since the 1950s, was born into a wealthy Jewish family in Vienna. The painting's current owner wasn't identified by the auction house.

Church in Cassone was part of the collection of Jorisch's great-uncle, Viktor Zuckerkandl, a steel magnate, and his wife Paula. When they died childless, their home and its contents were passed to Viktor's sister, Amalie, and her daughter, Mathilde, Jorisch's mother.

Canada slashes funds to UNRWA

Money redirected to bolstering PA justice system

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Canada has reduced its direct support for the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) – which runs Palestinian refugee camps in the West Bank Gaza, Syria, Jordan and Lebanon – and "redirected those funds to specific projects in the Palestinian Authority that will ensure accountability and foster democracy in the PA," Treasury Board President Vic Toews said last week.

In an interview, Toews, MP for the riding of Provencher in southeastern Manitoba, said that on Jan. 9, he met with Palestinian Minister of Planning and Administrative Development Ali Al-Jarbari in Ramallah, where funding to UNRWA was discussed.

Until now, Canada – which chairs the Refugee Working Group that was established in the wake of the Madrid Middle East summit in 1991 – has provided UNRWA with 11 per cent of its budget, which amounts to $10 million annually toward UNRWA's work in the refugee camps.

Toews said that in the past, funds Canada earmarked for UNRWA "went into a general operating fund" of the Palestinian treasury, and although Al-Jarbari asked that this situation continue, sending funds this way made it "difficult" for Canada to monitor how the funds were being used. Toews said Al-Jarbari asked that funds be given "directly" to the Palestinian treasury, but Toews refused.

Asked whether Ottawa had concerns that UNRWA funds were being administered by Hamas operatives, Toews responded that "Canada has made a $300-million commitment over five years to the Palestinian Authority, but we want to put that money only into programs that are consistent with Canadian values. We are going to focus our funds on institution-building in the PA, such as building a proper functioning justice system. We need to ensure that [the PA has] less wide discretion and the funds are being directed to specific projects."

He added, "I told [Al-Jarbari] that our paramount concern is the security of Israel."

Toews, a former director of the constitutional law branch at Manitoba's department of justice, said, "We are going to allocate money to training Palestinian prosecutors, and towards the office of the attorney general and the public prosecution office. If we train people properly, we will have the emergence of proper institutions necessary for a state."

Toews said that it's "obviously more difficult to monitor the use of money sent into general funds than specific projects." He noted that "overall Canada is not reducing the amount of money given to the PA, but it is now being re-directed in accordance with Canadian values."

Toews added: "Canada has pledged $20 million towards training prosecutors, judges, and police and building up the Palestinian judicial sector by building courthouses in Ramallah, Hebron and Tulkarm. But more important than building the courthouses is training the people… A fair and effective system of criminal justice with an efficient and independent prosecutions office and attorney general's office is integral to the process, and to securing long-term peace and stability in the Middle East. "

Toews also noted that this initiative to promote reform in the Palestinian justice system was being funded through the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA). He said that money sent to the PA through CIDA would be allocated to ensure accountability.

Toews indicated that he spoke with the Palestinians on behalf of Canada's minister of international development, Beverley Oda, who oversees CIDA.

Vic Toews

Canada's support of justice sector reforms in the PA is named "Sharaka," an Arabic word connoting trust and partnership. The initiative includes not only training people, but providing equipment, infrastructure and information technology systems.

Regarding the PA's police force, which is being trained in Jordan by Lt.-Gen. Keith Dayton of the United States, Toews said "Canada has the largest contingency under Gen. Dayton. We have 18 officers, and the United States only has 10."

After noting that he had spoken to an RCMP officer from Halifax and others, Toews said, "A full third of Palestinian Authority police have no training whatsoever."

Toews, who also visited Jordan during his trip, said that he met with the Jordanian prime minister, finance minister and planning minister, as well as the head of its atomic energy commission, "because Jordan is looking to produce nuclear energy for desalination."

He added: "They [the Jordanians] don't have water or energy that other Arab states have. We had very good discussions. Our Canadian technology, CANDU reactors, are not conducive to the development of weapons-grade uranium. I met with an expert… at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem who assured me that this was the case. I wanted to verify it myself."

Toews was in Israel on behalf of the government to participate in the second annual Manitoba-Israel Water Symposium hosted by the Jewish National Fund.

While in the West Bank, Toews also met with PA Justice Minister Ali Khashan and Attorney General Ahmed Al Mughani.

Landmark Winnipeg communal hall sold

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For Jewish Winnipeggers of a certain generation, the former Hebrew Sick Benefit Hall on Selkirk Avenue in North Winnipeg brings back memories of happy times.

For several decades, the hall – next door to Gunn's Bakery, one of Winnipeg's two kosher bakeries – was a centre for the Jewish community. It hosted synagogue services on yom tovim, as well as weddings, Yiddish plays and a variety of social events. However, in October, Congregation Etz Chayim – which inherited the building as a result of the merger of the Beth Israel, Bnay Abraham and Rosh Pina Synagogues in 2001 – sold the storied hall to a church group.

Jonathan Buchwald, Etz Chayim's executive director, noted that over the last couple of years, revenue from bingo at the hall had fallen steeply, and it had also become increasingly difficult to find volunteers to run the bingo.

"It didn't make sense to carry the building any longer," Buchwald says. "We decided last summer to sell and found a buyer.

"It is the end of an era."

The Hebrew Sick Benefit Association (HSBA) was founded in the early 1900s and became the largest of several mutual aid societies for Jewish immigrants to Winnipeg at a time before governments provided social services.

According to Allan Levine in his new book, Coming of Age: A History of the Jewish People of Manitoba, the HSBA in 1907 purchased the former St. Gyles Presbyterian Church on Selkirk Avenue and transformed it into the Queen's Theatre, a venue for Yiddish theatre that attracted the stars of North American Yiddish theatre.

Laurie Mainster grew up on Selkirk Avenue near the Queen's. He recalls having a walk-on part when he was four years old. "My parents used to host some of the visiting actors," he said. "A lot of local talent also blossomed at the theatre."

With the onset of the Depression and the growth of an English-speaking generation of Jewish Winnipeggers, the theatre fell on hard times. After a fire in the mid-1930s, the HSBA rebuilt the hall and modernized it as a Jewish community centre.

Max Hochman recalled that the hall hosted a lot of Jewish weddings on Sundays (and non-Jewish weddings on Saturday evenings). Hochman's father-in-law, Abraham Raber, operated the hall's concession counter in 1950 until his death in 1976.

"He sold soups, corned beef sandwiches, chocolates and drinks," Hochman said. "There was always a lot of activity. It kept him busy. Sarah [Hochman's late wife] and I helped out wherever we could. We ran the coat check. Young professional groups held their meetings at the hall. Cards were also a big deal."

Jack Raber, Max Hochman's brother-in-law, recalls that stags were also popular for grooms. "There would be gambling, with some of the money raked off for the groom," he said.

Mainster remembered High Holiday services that were led for a number of years by Cantor Jack Silverberg. "The HSBA Hall was the place to go," he said.

The hall began to be used for bingo in the 1960s and, after the HSBA merged with the Ateres Israel (Mizericher) shul to form the Beth Israel in Garden City, money raised from bingo was used to help fund the Beth Israel's operating expenses.

"It was only in the mid-'80s, when the Gambling Commission began monitoring gaming controls, that the bingo really began to make money," said Sid Kasner, a longtime Beth Israel member who served as the first president of Congregation Etz Chayim.

QJC addresses museum's role

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The story of the hundreds of thousands of Jews who were persecuted and forced to leave Arab countries should be included in the Canadian Museum for Human Rights, now under construction in Winnipeg, say Quebec Jewish Congress (QJC) and representatives of those Jewish communities now living in Montreal.

During two days of public and private hearings held by the museum in Montreal last week, Lisette Shashoua and Gladys Daoud, natives of Iraq, provided harrowing testimony of their own families' dispossession and flight from oppression and even physical danger in the 1960s and '70s. Since June, a museum advisory committee has been holding consultations in every province and territory on what Canadians think the museum's content should be. They are scheduled to conclude in Moncton, N.B., on Feb. 4.

Projected to open in 2012, the museum was a dream of the late Izzy Asper, founder of the Canwest Global media conglomerate, and has been carried on by his daughter, Gail Asper, since his death in 2003. Three levels of government are contributing to the $265-million cost, and the rest is being raised in the private sector. The museum has been a federal Crown corporation since 2008.

Securing legal counsel in key parenting disputes

Family Matters

Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator
for 28 years

Question: My ex-wife keeps saying that my nine-year-old daughter doesn't want to see me, even though we have a scheduled parenting plan. I haven't seen her in months. My wife keeps ignoring my emails.

I don't owe her any money. I would like to go to court to enforce our agreement. However, I'm not sure I want to hire a lawyer. I have a job, but lawyers are expensive. Legal Aid won't help me because I work. I have some assets and a modest income. What do I do?

Answer: Borrow the money, if necessary, but get an experienced family law lawyer. People have no hesitation to finance a car. Right now, the Ontario courts are grossly overburdened by litigants attempting to represent themselves. Judges often complain that they continually have to explain the law and procedure rather than administer justice. "Duty counsel" court appointed lawyers in each Ontario Family Court have very limited responsibilities and only give initial advice to such self-represented parents and Court appearances. They are not permitted to represent a parent.

Usually, parents who represent themselves have little idea how the law works, what their rights are and how best to avoid the procedural mistakes that can cost them serious money in court awards, nor do they know the best strategies to follow.

Most importantly, going to court may be the worst option of all. Good counsel can often avoid a courtroom confrontation altogether. They have all sorts of tools at their disposal that may avoid confrontation: mediation, arbitration, custody/access assessments, conciliation, four-way meeting of collaborative law. And when things go wrong — and cases do go wrong — that hardly damns the success of good counsel in most situations where the money is invested wisely.

Sadly, some children no longer see their absentee parents because the "other" dad or mom would not deploy the necessary resources to hire competent legal counsel. Years later, it is often impossible to seek access when the child is older.

Filmmaker explores spirituality in India

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Ben Feferman did not find his spirituality at a synagogue or a Shabbat dinner. He found it in India.

Feferman, who started the film production company Fef Films, spent six months in India with a cameraman and a mission – to explore the link between Judaism and eastern spirituality.

"I grew up not religious at all. Actually, I was really against Judaism," he said.

This changed when he was about 21 years old, around the same time that he started reading about eastern spirituality and Buddhism.

"I decided if I'm going to start exploring other paths, I'd like to explore Judaism," he said. "I started to go to Israel and to really make the effort to learn where I come from first. From there, I wanted to explore the world."

As Feferman started researching the idea of Jewish Buddhists, a statistic from the Los Angeles Times caught his attention.

"[It] said one-third of all Buddhist converts were Jewish. When I read that statistic, it really blew me away," he said. "It really made me think… 'What is it about Jewish people that points them in the direction of the East?' That's when I decided I was going to take an indefinite break to go to India."

Feferman also decided to turn his journey into his first documentary, which he called The Wandering Jew.

During his trip, the filmmaker visited meditation centres, monasteries and ashrams, which are places of religious retreat.

"It took some time to get adjusted and get oriented with the whole Indian scene," he said, adding that he was often exposed to poverty in India. "It really grounded me in terms of the way I lived, the way I spend my money."

Feferman started spending about $10 a day, ate simple meals and, every once in awhile, would sleep on front porches.

Feferman arrived in Mumbai two weeks after the city was attacked by several gunmen, who claimed about 101 victims.

"A lot of people told me it's not safe to go," he said. But Feferman refused to postpone his trip.

"This event really brought the community together," he said.

As time went on, Feferman found a way of identifying the Jews in a monastery.

"I would stand at the back of the class. When everyone would bow down to the guru, it was always the Jews who wouldn't bow down. I started to notice this trend," he said. "It didn't matter how religious they were, they just couldn't fully bow down. I'd go up to them after, I'd say, 'I know you're Jewish.' They'd be so shocked."

This was how Feferman began collecting Jewish stories. It was also how he learned that Jewish Buddhists are tied to their religious roots.

"I think it's something in the Jewish soul, there's some sort of mechanism that just wouldn't [bow]. The idea of idol worship is so deeply engraved," he said.

Feferman found that many of the Jews he was meeting were backpackers, tourists or businessmen.

Ben Feferman, 26, turned his spiritual journey in India into a documentary.

"It was a real mix, but they seemed to get along very well," he said.

His documentary, which he has submitted to the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, centres on the stories of seven "wandering Jews." One of the most memorable Jews is a psychiatrist from Baltimore who changed his name to Siddhartha. (Siddhartha Gautama is the Buddha's name.)

Currently in his late 60s or early 70s, Siddhartha was the only person who truly worked to distance himself from Judaism, Feferman said.

"Siddhartha was really someone who stripped himself of his past and wanted to start anew," he said. "He changed his name, stopped contact with his family and really went on a spiritual quest."

While Feferman was intrigued by Siddhartha's story, he doesn't necessarily agree with his point of view.

"I believe that in order to be in touch with your spiritual self, you first have to walk the path that you were born to," he said.

For Feferman, this path also involves the struggle of intertwining other religions with Judaism.

"It's sort of been really ingrained that anything outside of Judaism is wrong. You're a traitor, a heretic. Everyone's taught that," he said.

"I felt like I was teetering this line… I want to be able to explore spirituality outside of Judaism, but at the same time I'm very happy where I am Jewishly."

While Feferman spent six months filming, he spent about four months editing his footage.

"One of the main problems is that everything's in my head… It was my own personal journey. I didn't have a conclusion, I sort of had to be very artistically open-minded," he said. "It was an incredible experience because I got to relive the trip in the editing room."

Throughout the process, Feferman was determined not to preach.

"I'm not saying it's right to go to India, I'm not saying it's wrong. I'm just saying I felt the urge to do it. These are our stories, you make your own decisions," he said.

Israel's field hospital in Haiti focuses on saving lives

By NATASHA MOZGOVAYA
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

PORT-AU-PRINCE — The Israeli field hospital in the earthquake-stricken Haitian capital is a microcosm of the streets of the city, fluctuating between despair and hope amid the looting, violence and stories of miracles.

Each account takes on great importance against the background of the earthquake that devastated the Western Hemisphere's poorest country.

In the children's ward, located in a tent, is a baby under a year old. Someone left him here after he was pulled out of the rubble Sunday morning. He has open sores on his leg and does not make a sound except for a slight chirping when the doctor checks his leg. The doctors say he's in shock.

"His condition is stable, and pretty good, considering what he's been through," says Dr. Assaf Amit, who heads the children's emergency department. "He'll get antibiotics and surgery on the leg. It's a rare case of survival. Apparently, he was in an air pocket. When he came here, his condition was life-threatening."

His parents aren't here – they may be dead – but the Israeli nurses caress him and give him a warm bottle of milk.

"Apparently it's genetic, the ability to survive: he was lying in the rubble without food for five days," says Gali Wiest, the delegation's head nurse.

A baby around 18 months old lies on a bed in intensive care. She was admitted with an open sore and a massive infection throughout her body. The respirator shakes her every time it forces air into her. She has already been resuscitated a few times, and the team is not optimistic.

"We were shocked by the sights, and the nurses here have to cope with providing nursing care – it's a Third World country," Wiest says. "I have four children myself, and I was an emergency room nurse, but the sights here are very difficult and you need a lot of mental fortitude. We've already taken in 87 children, most in moderate to serious condition. There have been a few operations and amputations, and they keep coming."

But no one stays for long. The hospital has a two-week mandate, which is nothing compared to the time it takes to recover from complex injuries.

"We're all thinking about the fact that we discharge them into the street, in effect, because they have no home," Dr. Avi Yitzhak says. "But you have to make the right decision: either you take in 40 people and treat them for two weeks, or you try to save as many as possible to at least stop the primary injury."

Yitzhak immigrated to Israel from Ethiopia in 1991 and says he feels a special connection to the patients here. He says he knows the problems of practising medicine in the developing world.

Jeanne-Michelle cuddles her newborn whom she named Israel. Israeli medical workers look on. [Israel Sun photo]

"There's no organized network of clinics here, there's nowhere to discharge them to, and we have to treat as many people as possible, as long as it's still possible to save them," he says.

"When I went out on rescue yesterday, I saw what was happening in the streets – the bodies, the people who didn't know what to do. It's obvious that the work is very intensive, and I assume that we could burn out at a certain stage. But for now, we're full of energy and we're thrilled by our ability to help."

Willsmith Joseph, 9, had surgery Saturday to amputate his toes, which had developed gangrene. Sunday morning, he was in a deep sleep in the children's ward. His older brother knelt beside him. They will have to leave before noon. The nurse gives him two packets of antibiotics and some acetaminophen and tries to explain in English when to take them.

"Where are you going?" I ask the older boy.

"We have no place to go. To the tent encampment," he says. "Our house was ruined." Willsmith's face contorts in pain as he walks with his new crutches.

"Had we not amputated his toes, the gangrene would have spread and he would have died within days," Yitzhak explains. "Yes, it hurts, and there's an infection, but he'll live. It's a drop in the ocean, and it's frustrating, but we have to do the maximum to help as many people as possible."

Most of the wounds are infected and neglected – some people were pulled out of the rubble after being trapped for a few days, others simply couldn't get to a hospital or were turned away.

Max Darlene Azur, 29, came to the Israeli hospital with open wounds on both sides of her leg. For four days, she shouted and writhed in pain in the town square. The bodies of two of her cousins were still inside her home.

"I was in my room, and the wall simply collapsed onto my leg. But now I feel much better," she says.

The hospital also had its first birth Sunday. Jeanne-Michelle was brought in with labour pains and delivered a beautiful boy, her fourth child. Jeanne-Michelle sits indifferent most of the time, but when she says her newborn's name – Israel – a broad smile spreads across her face. "I feel fine," she says. She will be discharged within a few hours, to make room for other deliveries.

"It's very symbolic," Dr. Dar Shir says. "In a place where, even without the disaster, infant mortality is among the highest in the world and most women don't give birth in hospitals, the best experts in Israel delivered her baby. It's very moving and balances out a little the things that are happening here, and reminds us that a woman who is ready to give birth will do so even when there's an earthquake. It's what keeps the human race going. Of course it's a problem to discharge them under these conditions, but at least she delivered safely and both mother and baby are in excellent condition."

The field hospital's commander, Col. Itzik Kreis, a physician, says: "Throughout the night we continued to deal with saving lives; we received a number of patients in very poor shape who needed surgery and intensive care.

"For now, the other medical teams don't have the ability to provide more than first aid. We are focusing on saving lives," Kreis says. "Most of the injuries are a result of the earthquake, but in a few days, the situation can change, and regular patients will start to come in as well."

Israel and Germany hold historic joint cabinet session

BERLIN — German Chancellor Angela Merkel received Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Monday as an historic joint meeting of the two countries' cabinets got underway in Berlin.

The meeing was the second ever to take place, and the first on German soil. Approximately 10 ministers from each government took part in the talks.

"The joint government consultations are a very special event. Germany only conducts such meetings with a very few partners," German government spokesperson Christoph Steegmans said ahead of the Merkel-Netanyahu meeting.

Prior to the noontime meeting, Netanyahu held talks with Merkel and took a tour of a memorial located near the Brandenburg Gate in honour of European Jewry murdered during the Holocaust. The prime minister was also expected to visit the Jewish Museum in Berlin and to meet with the speaker of the Bundestag during his visit.

The two sides were expected to discuss security issues – including the potential for further sanctions on Iran – as well as development projects and environmental topics, the spokesperson said.

High on the agenda at the meeting will also be Israeli plans to buy a German-built Dolphin class submarine, as well as two missile boats, at a total cost of around one billion euros. Germany has become the main supplier of equipment to the Israeli navy, which already operates three German Dolphins.

Foreign analysts say the submarine is capable of launching ballistic missiles carrying nuclear warheads.

Two of the crafts are now under construction in Germany and are expected to be sold to Israel in the coming years. Over the past months the two allies have also held talks over the sale to Israel of a sixth Dolphin, as well as two 'stealth' missile boats.

Germany and Israel established diplomatic ties in 1965, 20 years after the end of the Holocaust, in which six million Jews were murdered by the Nazis.

The first German-Israeli cabinet meeting was held in Jerusalem in March 2008, when Merkel travelled to Israel and addressed the Knesset.

Israel Briefs

Deputy FM apologizes

Israel's deputy foreign minister officially apologized to Turkey over a public reprimand of its ambassador. Daniel Ayalon apologized for calling in Ahmet Oguz Celikkol and embarrassing him in front of TV cameras after the Turkish prime minister's recent verbal attack on Israel and a new anti-Israel Turkish TV drama. "Although we have our differences of opinion on several issues, they should be discussed and solved only through open, reciprocal and respectful diplomatic channels between our two governments," read Ayalon's letter, which was given to the Turkish ambassador to send to Ankara. The ambassador was made to sit on a lower chair than Ayalon and the table between them only displayed an Israeli flag. Ayalon did not shake Celikkol's hand. Turkish President Abdullah Gul told Al Jazeera he had threatened to recall his ambassador if Israel did not issue a formal apology.

Jordan wants scrolls

The Jordanian government has asked the United Nations to help it take the Dead Sea Scrolls from Israel. Jordan last week filed a complaint with UNESCO, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, claiming that Israel stole the 900 ancient religious text fragments from an eastern Jerusalem museum during the Six-Day War in 1967. Canada rejected a request by Jordan earlier this month to confiscate the documents under international law. The scrolls recently completed a successful exhibition at the Royal Ontario Museum in Toronto. A Jordanian antiquities official said in a statement that Jordan has documents to prove it owns the scrolls.

Jordanian suspect arrested

An Amman taxi driver was arrested on suspicion of involvement in the last week bombing of an Israeli diplomatic convoy in Jordan, Al-Arabiya reported. No one was injured in the attack, in which two remote-controlled bombs were detonated close to the Allenby Bridge crossing just as a convoy of Israeli diplomats visiting Jordan passed. Four diplomats and two security guards were heading to Israel for the weekend from Amman, according to reports. After the bombing, Jordan's foreign minister reportedly called Israel's ambassador to Jordan, who was not in the convoy, to assure him that all efforts were being made to arrest those responsible for the attack.

Minaret ban opposed by 43 per cent of Israelis

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A plurality of Israelis would oppose legislation to ban the construction of minarets on mosques in Israel, according to a survey conducted by an American organization dedicated to promoting racial harmony and strengthening inter-group relations.

Rabbi Marc Schneier

The Foundation for Ethnic Understanding (FFEU), based in New York City, found that 43 per cent of Israelis rejected a ban, while 28 per cent backed one. Twenty nine per cent of respondents were undecided.

The telephone survey was carried out recently by Keevoon Research, and 500 Jewish Israelis were interviewed.

The survey was commissioned on the heels of a referendum in Switzerland in which 57.5 per cent of voters supported a proposal to ban the building of new minarets in the country.

At present, there are four minarets in Switzerland, serving a community of 400,000 Muslims.

The proposal, opposed by the Swiss government, was put forward by the right-wing Swiss People's party (SVP), the largest party in parliament. The SVP claims that minarets are a sign of Islamization and Islamic power.

Last November's referendum took place at a time when European nations are engaged in a debate on how best to integrate Muslim citizens and address such issues as Islamic head scarves.

By some estimates, Europe is home to 10 to 15 million Muslims.

Rabbi Marc Schneier, president of FFEU, was gratified by the results of the survey.

"When it comes to freedom of religion, Israelis are apparently much more tolerant than their Swiss counterparts," he said in an interview last week. "Israelis understand that all religious symbols deserve our respect and tolerance."

The survey also found that the strongest resistance to banning minarets came from Israelis in the national religious camp, who politically are the most right-wing in Israel.

Seventy two per cent of such Israelis expressed opposition to the ban, compared to 42 per cent of secular Israelis and 36 per cent of "traditional" Israelis.

"The poll shows a definite correlation between religious observance and tolerance toward Islam," said Rabbi Schneier, a past president of the North American Board of Rabbis and chair of the American section of the World Jewish Congress.

He added: "Israelis seem to put politics aside, and opposition to banning minarets actually increases as we move further to the right on the political spectrum. The fact that less than one-third of Israelis support banning minarets indicates that from the Israeli point of view, there is room for respectful coexistence between Jews and Israeli Arabs when it is based on religion and not politics."

Fire strikes Crete synagogue for second time

JTA

ATHENS — The only synagogue on the Greek island of Crete caught fire for the second time in 10 days in what is believed to be an arson attack.

An early Saturday morning fire at the Etz Hayyim synagogue in the city of Hania destroyed the roof of the building as well as scores of books.

Two fire engines and five firefighters arrived on the scene and took two hours to get the fire under control.

The fire brigade is investigating the cause of the fire and hasn't ruled out arson.

The synagogue was already seriously damaged in a Jan. 5 arson attack, which destroyed some 30 antique Turkish carpets and the synagogue's extensive library. The arsonists reportedly climbed over the shul's iron gate and made an improvised firebomb using stuffing from a couch in the synagogue's mikveh to ignite a canister filled with flammable liquid.

Until 1999, Etz Hayyim was a desecrated house of prayer that remained the sole Jewish monument on the island of Crete after the destruction of its Jewish community in 1944 by the Nazis. From 1996 until its re-dedication in 1999, the structure had been painstakingly restored.

The Jews of Crete are first mentioned in the Second Maccabees. The city came into administrative prominence during Hellenistic times and attracted artisans and technicians from Alexandria. It's likely the members of this early Jewish community were originally from Egypt.

Damage in the second attack is estimated at $43,000 (US), since the wooden roof was completely destroyed.

Synagogue director Nikos Stavroulakis said that four computers as well as 300 CDs and cassette tapes of Jewish music were also destroyed.

Manitoba-Israel Water Symposium starts with a splash

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — This week, some 20 water scientists, half of them from Israel and half from Manitoba, are touring Israel's key water sites as part of the second Manitoba-Israel Water Symposium, hosted by the Keren Kayemeth LeIsrael – The Jewish National Fund (KKL-JNF).

Over the course of their six-day trip, the group of Manitoban and Israeli researchers and policy-makers are scheduled to visit the Mekorot National Pumping Station, the water recycling and allocation site at Kibbutz Dafna, the Hula Valley, Lake Kinneret, and the rehabilitation project at the Alexander River.

The aim of the tour is to deepen Manitoba delegation members' understanding of the issues facing Israel and the innovations that have emerged to combat these challenges, as well as to boost international co-operation between the province and the state on mutual water issues.

"We have been focusing mostly on the water issues that are common to both Israel and Manitoba, in order to promote mutually beneficial research projects," said Prof. Avi Gafni, the symposium's co-ordinator from the KKL-JNF. "We hope to strengthen the tie between Manitoba and us, so that both of us – in Canada and in Israel – will benefit from our research findings."

According to Gafni, despite vast differences in climate and scale, the province and state face many of the same water issues, including problems involving the reconstruction and maintenance of watersheds and wetlands. Both could benefit from research on water-resource treatment, conservation and management and water quality. They could also benefit from research on wetland/watershed-related issues such as the impact of overpumping, water level, fishing on freshwater sources, and factors affecting water source's resilience capacity.

"Whether you have a lot of water or a limited amount, you still have to steward it and protect it," said Manitoban Minister of Water Stewardship Christine Melnick, who initiated the first Water Experts Symposium in Manitoba in August 2008. That event was attended by Israel's minister of agriculture and rural development, Shalom Simhon, and Efi Stenzler, the world president of Keren Kayemeth LeIsrael (KKL-JNF).

Having coped with decades of water shortage, Israel has engineered unparalleled solutions for dealing with water issues. "Why reinvent the wheel when there is this world expert with such tremendous experience?" Melnick said.

"For many of the [Manitoban] scientists participating this year, this trip is their first to Israel. They are astounded at how Israelis have made the desert bloom in so many ways. One of the scientists told me that coming here has been like being projected into the future. The country is so incredibly innovative when it comes to water."

Dwight Williamson, one of the participating scientists from Manitoba, couldn't agree more. "I have already learned so many things, and as the week goes on and we begin to exchange specific information from one researcher to another, I am learning more and more," he said. "The ways that water is managed in the central and northern parts of Israel is inspiring and generating many ideas that we will be able to take back with us to Manitoba."

The scientists will also conduct brainstorming sessions on areas of potential co-operation. Melnick mentions one: research into algal blooms, from which both Lake Manitoba and Lake Kinneret suffer.

Israel dried up the Hula Valley wetland in the 1950s to create more agricultural land and thereby caused severe damage to Lake Kinneret. Lake Winnipeg and Manitoba's Netley/Libau wetlands are also in need of major rehabilitation.

At the end of the meeting of minds, scientists will propose different research project ideas, and as was the case for the first symposium, the winner will receive a $100,000 (Cdn) grant.

Last symposium's winning project, a joint initiative between scientists from the Galilee Technology Center in Israel (MIGAL), the International Institute for Sustainable Development in Manitoba, and a scientist in Mexico, is called the Agricultural Wetland/Watershed Research Network. It's an online international database of research on wetlands and watersheds.

It's uncertain at this point what sort of collaborations will take place in the future. Melnick doesn't rule out the possibility of co-operative efforts between independent organizations.

"There are all sorts of incredible discussions happening," she said. "There is a great openness here [in Israel] among scientists, to collaboration and knowledge sharing. I am sure this will be a long, deep and lasting relationship."

The White Ribbon is a stark parable about the roots of fascism in Germany

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Michael Haneke's stark, subtle film, The White Ribbon, is a cautionary tale about the dangers of stifling conformity, absolutism and regimentation.

Since it is set in a German village, on the eve of World War I, it may be seen as a troubling parable on the roots of fascism in Germany.

Shot in black and white, this challenging German-language film with English subtitles turns on a series of strange and mysterious incidents that threaten to upend the peace and stability of a bland, obscure village.

A doctor riding a horse collides with a nearly invisible wire, injuring his arm. The son of a local baron is beaten. A barn goes up in flames. A woman is killed in a sawmill accident. A pet bird is found dead, its body pierced by the blade of a scissor. A cabbage field is ravaged. Children vanish, only to turn up.

Haneke uses these random and apparently unrelated incidents to explore themes such as hatred, malice, cruelty and collective barbarity, the very qualities the Nazis nurtured and exploited in their drive for power.

The White Ribbon, which opened in Toronto last week and won the Golden Globe award for best foreign film, is narrated by the village school teacher as he reflects on the events that rattled its residents.

That he has been chosen to tell the story is hardly a coincidence. He's a composed fellow who has no axe to grind and therefore can be trusted to tell the truth.

And in this somnolent village, the truth is a bitter thing.

The doctor (Rainer Bock), a thoroughly unpleasant person, is a widower who verbally abuses his housekeeper and may be guilty of physically abusing his daughter.

The strait-laced pastor (Burghart Klaussner), so rigid and unbending, subjects his children to a severe form of discipline, forcing each to wear a white ribbon – a symbol of innocence and purity – until they conform to his unyielding moral standards.

The remote and unsympathetic baron (Ulrich Tukur), an omniponent figure who presides over harvest feasts with a sense of noblesse oblige, finds his world in a shambles after his wife (Ursina Lardi) announces she has fallen in love with an Italian banker and intends to leave him.

Virtually the only characters who elicit our empathy and sympathy are the teacher (Christian Friedel) and the nanny (Leonie Benesch), both of whom are ripe for romance and love.

Christian Friedel and Leonie Benesch

Compared to the doctor, pastor or baron, they seem well-adjusted and reasonably "normal."

In a scene that appears to distil the traditional rituals of courtship in rural, early 20th-century Germany, the teacher visits the nanny's family to announce his marital intentions. Before he can even utter a word, her cut-and-dried father cuts him off unceremoniously and spells out the terms of engagement.

It's the only faintly amusing moment in the film, since Haneke has his sights set on more pivotal matters. For him, the issue of importance is the tyranny and violence that contributed to the rise of totalitarianism in Germany. This theme asserts itself subliminally but powerfully in The White Ribbon.

Lies My Father Told Me released on DVD

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Jan Kadar's Lies My Father Told Me, a sentimental period piece set in Montreal in the 1920s, holds up rather well after 35 years. Restored by Ergo Media and due to be released in Canada as a DVD on Jan. 26, it's a portrait of a struggling working-class Jewish family.

Based on a story by Montreal writer Ted Allan, it's heart-warming yet hard. Allan appears in the film as a cocksure Marxist who's out to save the world from capitalism, but he is a marginal character, a foil to Zeyda, a rumpled, bearded Fiddler-on-the-Roof figure played by Yossi Yadin, the Israeli actor.

A traditional east European Jew who ekes out a living selling second-hand goods from his horse-drawn cart, Zeyda is loved by his six-year-old grandson, David (Jeff Lynas) but scorned by his ambitious son-in-law, Harry Herman (Len Birman).

Harry's patient wife, Annie (Marilyn Lightstone), finds herself caught in the middle, since they all live together in a dingy flat in what Harry derisively describes as "a stinking neighbourhood."

Much of Lies My Father Told Me unfolds in and around their courtyard dwelling during the depths of winter, while the rest is filmed in the bright sunshine of spring and summer.

Cinematographers Paul Van der Linden and Arpad Makay portray Montreal as an insular city filled with faceless tenements and imposing high stone walls, leaving the impression that it might have been plucked from a shtetl in Poland.

The opening scene sets the tone. Zeyda, steering his old white horse through snow-bound wintry streets and lanes, shouts in a sing-song voice, "Rags, clothes and bottles."

Hawking castoffs, Zeyda gets by, but he's far better off than Harry, an aspiring entrepreneur who's convinced that his patent for creaseless trousers will be his ticket to prosperity.

"It will cause a revolution in the men's clothing industry," he claims. "This could put us all on easy street."

All he needs is a $500 loan from his father-in-law, but Zeyda is rightfully skeptical. If you'll excuse the pun, Harry has yet to iron out the imperfections in his invention. In the meantime, Harry has to put bread on the table, so he gambles on horse races.

Though he depends on Zeyda's largesse to some degree, Harry has a low opinion of him, regarding him as a religious fanatic. Nor is he happy that Zeyda boards his aging, smelly nag in a stable adjacent to their home.

As Zeyda and Harry feud, David, who often accompanies Zeyda on his rounds, sides with his grandfather. In fact, he likens Harry's derogatory assessment of Zeyda to "terrible lies."

But as he learns more about his surroundings and life itself, David discovers still more "lies." These jolting discoveries, two of which concern sex and nipples, are part and parcel of growing up. Kadar handles these situations with good taste and humour.

The film, propelled by Allan's strong screenplay and fine performances from the lead actors, abounds with eccentric characters, among whom are Baumgarten the ranting Marxist, Edna (Carole Lazare), the local prostitute, and Mrs. Tannenbaum (Barbara Chilcott), a shrill woman who complains about Zeyda's steed and whose husband seems fond of adulterous encounters.

Three decades after it was filmed on location in Montreal, Lies My Father Told Me remains a quintessential Canadian film about a boy's evolving view of the world, the vagaries of human nature and the Jewish immigrant experience in Canada.

Flying Bulgars dive into darkness with new CD

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

After more than 20 years as a musician, David Buchbinder has turned into a storyteller.

And soon, he'll be taking his stories to the stage.

On Jan 31, Buchbinder and his band, the Flying Bulgars, will turn their newest CD, Tumbling Into Light, into a multimedia concert, complete with images, film and dance.

While Buchbinder has participated in multimedia shows, he decided to take this one to a higher level, he said.

"I wanted to… bring in other disciplines in order to give the audience a much more expanded experience in music," he said. "Once we made this record, I really began to feel so strongly about it… that I got inspired to want to not just do concerts or CD releases."

The CD itself, which was released in November of last year, took Buchbinder and the band's vocalist, Dave Wall, about three years to write. Unlike the Flying Bulgars' other albums, Tumbling Into Light is mostly in English rather than Yiddish and has fewer instrumental songs.

"[We] wanted to move into an area that was completely original music while maintaining a deep connection with Jewish sound," Buchbinder said, adding that he decided to move away from writing in Yiddish.

"We wanted to open up the stylistic range of what we were doing… we wanted almost all the songs to be in English. Yiddish is a language understood by very few," he said.

Buchbinder decided to keep some instrumental songs on the CD.

"I think it's kind of important. Pure instrumental music is abstract, and I love that," he said. "It creates a space that's more fluid and that's not telling you as much what the story is, and so you paint your own pictures to it."

While Buchbinder is used to writing instrumentals, adding lyrics proved to be a challenge.

David Buchbinder, on trumpet, with the Flying Bulgars.

"I wrote a certain amount of songs as a teen with lyrics, then I didn't," he said. "My goal was to write some of these songs… It's so hard to write lyrics that don't suck. It's so easy to be too on the nose or to be completely obscure… you have to get to that sweet spot."

Buchbinder is proudest of Into Light, which he wrote by himself. The last song on the CD, it's an exploration of finding light through dark or seemingly hopeless situations.

The first song on the album, Angel, explores the story of Jacob and the angel who wrestles with him and later blesses him with the name Israel.

"Our question is, was it a blessing? Perhaps there are ways in which we need to reinvent ourselves. For us, that's a Jewish theme," he said. "So we go into some of the darkness, it has to do with the walls that are rooted between people."

The song Into Light, as well as the whole album, touches on the idea of having to delve into darkness, or difficult situations.

"It's not all bad. In the deeper places, the harder places, you learn a lot," he said. "Each time you come out of it, you know more."

While writing, Buchbinder drew from personal experiences, including his father's death.

"I've had harder times and easy, celebratory times… The tougher times where it's hard to have hope and it's hard to see… you have to recognize it as a cycle. When you go into the darkness, you will come out into the light again."

Before Buchbinder and Wall started working on lyrics, they decided to write letters to themselves from the future.

"It's almost like a sweet little cheat. Let's find out what [the album's] about before we know," he said.

For Buchbinder, the CD made him realize that life isn't a circle, but a spiral, he said.

"If you're just going from light into darkness, that's kind of a drag. But if it's not a circle but a spiral, [then] each time you come around, you're in a new place."

The Flying Bulgars' multimedia show will debut on Jan. 31 at Toronto's Young Centre for the Performing Arts. For tickets, call 416-866-8666.

The Believer*, with Strangers: The Toronto Jewish Film Society launches its new season with The Believer, Henry Bean's provocative tale, based on a true story, about a Nazi skinhead named Danny Balint (Ryan Gosling), whose virulent anti-Semitism disguises the fact that he was born a Jew. His final confrontation with the demons tormenting him makes for "a stunning piece of work."

Also being screened is Strangers, about a Jew and Muslim who encounter each other on the Paris subway, with unexpected results. The films are introduced by critic Adam Nayman. Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, Al Green Theatre. Sunday Jan. 24. Two screenings, 4 and 7:30 p.m. $15.

Light in The Piazza*: Mitchell Marcus, artistic producer of the Acting Up Stage Company, is readying for the opening of The Light in The Piazza, a Tony Award-winning musical set in 1950s Italy about an unusual romance that seems to have overtones of Henry James. The lovers are a young, handsome Italian and a 26-year-old mentally challenged American woman whose mother struggles to accept "a love that transcends language, culture and circumstance." The piece traverses a fine line between musical theatre and opera, even as it tells a story that unfolds in both English and Italian

The Light in The Piazza runs Jan. 30 to Feb. 21 at the Berkeley Street Theatre Downstairs, 26 Berkeley St. $30 to $45; students $22. 416-368-3110, www.lightinthepiazza.ca

Names in the News: The YIVO Institute for Jewish Research has received a gift of about $4.5 million (US) from the estate of Michael (Mickey) Ross, an award-winning television writer who was the son of Jewish immigrant parents. The National Yiddish Book Center and the Los Angeles Jewish Foundation have also received gifts from the estate.

Ross, born Isidore Rovinsky in 1919 in New York City, was an Emmy Award-winning writer and part of the team that created the television shows All in the Family (along with Norman Lear), The Jeffersons, and Three's Company during the 1970s and '80s. His earlier credits include The Martha Raye Show and The Gary Moore Show. Ross said of himself: "I was born of immigrant parents. I loved their attitude, their ways, their morals. I don't want to see that lost."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Snorkellers overwhelmed by underwater sculpture park

By JOSEPH SERGE
Travel editor

ST. GEORGE'S, Grenada — There are many beautiful places worth visiting on this tiny Caribbean island's 300 square kilometers, and all are within a short ride of your hotel.

After you've experienced the colourful capital city of St.George's, with its historic fort and fragrant spice market, there are a few half-day trips I strongly recommend.

A snorkel trip to the underwater sculpture park is a must.

I wasn't sure what to expect when I went on this snorkelling trip with Dive Grenada. [www.divegrenada.com] The underwater sculptures are located just off Molinere Bay on Grand Anse Beach, where most hotels are located. I took a boat ride with maybe 10 other people for about 10 minutes or so, then we stopped and donned our flippers and masks and jumped in.

At first the sheer beauty of what I was witnessing overwhelmed me. The water was so clear, so crisp and so calm. Schools of colourful fish were all around me, so close I could touch some. I was so absorbed in this, I found myself falling behind my group of snorkellers.

As I caught up to them, I was amazed at what I saw. It was surreal to see, and words cannot accurately convey the scene.

Below me was Vicissitudes, a bizarre concrete and steel sculpture of a group of life-size children standing in a circle, holding hands and staring outward. The water was shallow and clear enough for me to get a good view of it from the surface, but if I wanted to get close up, I was only one deep breath away.

Farther along I saw other statues: La Diablesse was a goddess standing serenely watching over the display. Farther along was The Lost Correspondent, a clerk typing at a desk. The detail is so amazing, you can even read the newspapers on it.

The most surreal display was Grace Reef, which showed a group of women lying prone, as if dead, on the ocean floor.

British artist Jason de Caires Taylor installed this sculpture park, the first of its kind, in 2006. The goal was to create an artificial reef to form a sanctuary for the abundant marine life in the waters. It took around six months to put together. It's truly an amazing sight. If your children are good swimmers, they will also get a kick out of the sculpture park. Visit www.underwatersculpture.com and look at the film in the gallery section.

The Seven Sisters Falls

There are some tiny jellyfish in the area that irritated me with mosquito-bite-like stings, but otherwise they were pretty harmless.

If you are feeling energetic, or adventurous, another trip worth taking is to the Seven Sisters Falls in the Grand Etang rainforest, in the middle of the island. There are numerous waterfalls in Grenada and its sister islands, Carriacou and Petite Martinique. The Concord Waterfall, for instance, is a smaller falls, easily accessible by car and frequently part of an organized day trip around the island.

But the Seven Sisters Falls is far more majestic, although you do have to take a 30- to 40-minute hike down through the lush, green rainforest.

It is not recommended to do this alone, so I suggest you book an organized tour from your hotel. Your guide will point out all the wild plant life, including the island's famous callaloo (a green root vegetable that when cooked has the consistency of spinach, and used in soups and many local dishes), the cocoa trees and the island's ubiquitous nutmeg trees. More importantly, he will guide you down the at-times rough descent over rocks and steep terrain. You will need good boots and sure, steady feet. It can also get slippery and muddy, especially if it's rained recently. And this being the rainforest, there's a good chance of that.

My group's guide was a 70-year-old professional hiker, Telfor Bedeau, who claims he hikes more than 20,000 kilometers each year. No wonder he didn't break a sweat while I huffed and puffed my way down, tentatively testing each step, sweating from places I didn't know could sweat.

Once you get down, though, you can cool off in the refreshing pool at the foot of the falls.

Hiking down a hill in the rainforest to witness a waterfall is one of those things you just won't get a chance to do in Canada, so I highly recommend it. Depending on your fitness level, it can be a bit demanding. The climb back up to the top, while not as tricky, can be very strenuous on the legs and lungs. My legs felt like jelly for days afterward. Bring a bottle or two of water with you, but otherwise travel lightly.

Known as the Spice Island of the Caribbean, Grenada is located at the southernmost tip of the Windward Islands. There are more than 40 beaches and many natural preserves. The temperatures in winter are ideal. January through May is dry season and temperatures in winter are around 25C to 30C.

The islands have a population of around 108,000, and English is the official language.

Air Canada and Sunwing Vacations operate direct flights from Toronto from January to April. You can also fly via Barbados.

Joseph Serge was a guest of the Grenada Board of Tourism and stayed at the Spice Island Beach Resort.

Some recent biographies and autobiographies

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Samuel Johnson, the 18th-century British literary critic and the subject of the world's best-known biography, once said the art of biography is rarely well executed because only those who live with a person "can write his life with any genuine exactness and discrimination" but that few in such a position "know what to remark about him."

Johnson more or less hand-picked his biographer by drawing a worshipful James Boswell into his inner circle and encouraging him to record his daily life and utterances for posterity. The two travelled together and were often together for days at a time. Johnson occasionally would remind Boswell that a "panegyrick" – an account of a life containing only virtues and no vices – is not a fitting biography: someone professing "to write a life," Johnson contended, "must represent it as it really was."

After diarizing his frequent encounters with Johnson for more than 20 years, Boswell published his monumental Life of Samuel Johnson. It's still often cited as the best biography ever written, despite the fact that it largely neglects Johnson's early life and takes a clearly hagiographic attitude toward its subject while not neglecting some of the warts.

The Victorians excelled in highlighting the most heroic, virtuous and Christian aspects of their biographical subjects. But in 1918 Lytton Strachey published Eminent Victorians, in which he knocked a quartet of idols off their pedestals. Ever since, biography has continued to explore the degraded lower depths of human experience, sometimes to alarming degrees. Joyce Carol Oates coined a new word – "pathography" – for biographies excessively concerned with character defects, sins and loathsome deeds. Remember Mommie Dearest? A parallel trend has been evident in autobiography ever since Rousseau's Confessions (1782) and De Quincey's Confessions of an English Opium Eater (1821).

Johnson felt that a "judicious and faithful narrative" of almost any person's life could be useful because every man has "great numbers in the same condition with himself, to whom his mistakes and miscarriages, escapes and expedients, would be of immediate and apparent use."[1] He also contended that despite the vast differences in our lives, human beings share a universal aspect that keeps us interested in reading about each other.

Having perused a handful of such books over the winter holidays, it seems to me that many such entries may enjoy their moment in the sun, but few are likely to make a lasting impression.

Paul Shaffer, a Jewish musician from Thunder Bay, Ont., has written a "swingin' show-biz saga" with We'll Be Here for the Rest of Our Lives. Shaffer lapped up his first applause as a 12-year-old organist in his hometown synagogue and continued to bask in audience appreciation as bandleader for The Late Show with David Letterman ("the gig of gigs," he calls it). An inveterate name-dropper and storyteller, his star-studded celebrity autobiography presents colourful and entertaining tales about the Saturday Night Live crowd, Phil Spector, Jerry Lewis, Eric Clapton, Cher, Britney Spears, Ringo Starr, and many others ad infinitum.

It's interesting to compare Shaffer's book to that of Howie Mandel, another talented Canadian who made it big in the American entertainment industry. Mandel's book, Here's the Deal – Don't Touch Me, tends toward the confessional mode as he expands upon his various fears, anxiety disorders and phobias, again ad infinitum. His reason for becoming a comedian, he explains, was basically to distract himself from more serious concerns: "If I'm making myself laugh, then I'm distracted from all the other things going on in my head that are, at times, tortuous."

A former resident of the north Toronto neighbourhood of Bathurst Manor, Mandel catapulted to enormous fame on television, which I rarely watch: I think I've seen him only once, on an old rerun of St. Elsewhere. But that has not prevented me from enjoying anecdotes from the book, which jump out from almost any page. Here's the Deal – Don't Touch Me details Mandel's rise in show business and provides telling glimpses of celebs met along the way.

As far as celebrities go, I'm far more interested in movie stars from Hollywood's golden era. Donald Spoto is the famed biographer of a whole sidewalk's worth of Hollywood stars, including Audrey Hepburn, Ingrid Bergman, James Dean, Marlene Dietrich, Laurence Olivier and Elizabeth Taylor. He's also crafted worthy books on filmmakers such as Preston Sturges, Stanley Kramer and Alfred Hitchcock. Having enjoyed several of these works, I recently opened the latest Spoto biography – High Society: The Life of Grace Kelly – and was not disappointed.

Provided you appreciate movies such as High Noon, Rear Window, High Society and To Catch A Thief, you'll find plenty to appreciate in this warmly written bio. It's brimming with cinematic lore and quotes from James Stewart, Hitchcock, Cary Grant and many others – including, of course, Prince Ranier of Monaco, whose marriage to Kelly essentially marked the end of her cinematic career. The book came out only recently because the princess had requested that Spoto not write her life story until 25 years after her death.

Those of us who lived through the Beatles phenomenon or who simply love Beatle music will likely enjoy John Lennon: The Life. This recent biography by Philip Norman presents an enjoyable compendium of Beatle lore, supposedly including some new, hitherto unpublicized details of his life. The pleasure lies in the revelation of John's personality and the circumstances under which many of his songs were written.

Often the biography, autobiography or memoir written by a lowly commoner, with no claim to previous celebrity, makes for the best reading of all. I close my brief survey of some current titles with what seems to me the most outstanding title in the lot – Lucette Lagnado's The Man in the White Sharkskin Suit: My Family's Exodus from Old Cairo to the New World. Here we have an ordinary person spinning a dramatic family saga that far excels the other books in terms of literary merit.

The Lagnados were among the 900,000 Jews who fled the Arab world. The author vividly re-creates the majesty and glamour of life in Cairo in the years from the end of World War II to Nasser's rise to power. The family packed their belongings into 26 suitcases and hid their jewels and gold coins in sealed tins of marmalade. With much poverty and hardship, they made their way to Paris and then New York. Lagnado writes beautifully and compellingly of the crimes committed against her father and the high drama of escaping a dangerous regime, no matter the cost. The Man in the White Sharkskin Suit is a memorable autobiographical memoir and a valuable addition to our literature about the Sephardi world.

Attack on Crete synagogue carries symbolic meaning

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
JTA

ROME — The vandals who torched the historic Etz Hayyim synagogue in Hania, an ancient port on the Greek island of Crete, left no doubt about their motives.

After breaking into the building on the night of Jan. 5 and setting its interior alight, they threw a bar of soap against its outer wall.

A bar of soap? That's because, explains the synagogue's director, Nikos Stavroulakis, "I'll make you into a bar of soap" is a common anti-Semitic taunt in Greece. Since the Holocaust, there has been a persistent belief that the Nazis made soap from Jewish corpses.

Even though scholars have disproved the idea, bars of soap have been buried reverently in some European Jewish cemeteries under solemn memorials.

"In this place lie the remains of Jewish martyrs exterminated by German fascists and turned into soap," reads the inscription on an obelisk in Piatra Neamt, Romania.

The power of this belief was examined in The Soap Myth, a play by Jeff Cohen that ran last summer in New York. Based on a true story, the play focused on the efforts of an elderly Holocaust survivor "on a one-man mission to get the 'soap myth' reclassified as fact," Marissa Brostoff wrote in Tablet magazine.

But at the heart of the story was something much more.

What was at stake, Brostoff wrote, was "the way we choose to see the past, a struggle between a dispassionate approach relying on facts and figures and another, much more subjective one that holds survivors' testimonies to be unarguably true and ultimately sacred."

Anti-Semitic violence is anything but dispassionate.

The bar of soap hurled against the desecrated synagogue in Hania was a diabolically mixed metaphor: soap usually symbolizes purity and godliness, but in this twisted context it spelled hatred and death.

The attack on the Hania synagogue was not just an assault on a building. It was an assault on the ideals that had transformed the structure from a wrecked relic of Holocaust destruction to a new symbol of community and compassion.

This transformation was accomplished largely through the efforts of Stavroulakis, a remarkable man who has devoted much of the past two decades to restoring a Jewish presence to a city made "Judenrein" by the Nazis.

I met Stavroulakis when I visited Hania in 1996. An artist, author and scholar who co-founded and directed the Jewish Museum in Athens, Stavroulakis had returned to live in his family's rambling house in Hania after many years away.

The synagogue, which dates back to the 15th century, was in ruin. But over the next three years, Stavroulakis made it his mission to raise funds and, with the help of the World Monuments Fund and other donors, oversee the building's rebirth. His aim was to make it a living spiritual presence, not simply a restored reminder of the past.

The synagogue now functions as a museum, and it hosts exhibitions and cultural events.

It's also an active house of worship. A small Havurah community whose members include Christians and some Muslims – as well as Jews of all persuasions – regularly assembles there to celebrate Shabbat and Jewish holidays.

Stavroulakis himself leads daily prayers each morning, whether a minyan is present or not.

Prayers were held as usual at 9 a.m. Jan. 6, the morning after the arson attack. The fire had gutted a stairway, wreaked havoc on the synagogue library, and covered walls and precious furnishings with a thick layer of soot.

"Fortunately," Stavroulakis said, "the fabric of the synagogue was and is intact."

He was referring to the physical structure of the building, but I think he also meant that the symbolic identity of the synagogue also had survived – and would be maintained.

"We must be angry over what has happened to our synagogue," he told the small group of worshippers gathered for prayers amid the soot. "If we were not, it would be an indication that we were either indifferent or morally numb."

But, Stavroulakis asked, just where should the anger be directed? Local indifference and the ignorance that promotes racism had to be addressed.

"We have tried at Etz Hayyim to be a small presence in the midst of what is at times almost aggressive ignorance," he wrote on the synagogue blog. "We have done this to such a degree that our doors are open from early in the morning until late in the day so that the synagogue assumes its role as a place of prayer, recollection and reconciliation."

There is, Stavroulakis wrote, little if any sign of overt security.

"This character of the synagogue must not change and the doors must remain open," he wrote. If not, that means "we have given in to the ignorance that has perpetrated this desecration."

A week after the attack, the Etz Hayyim blog posted pictures showing that thanks in large part to volunteers, the walls of the sanctuary had been painted and other clean-up work was well under way.

"The impact of this [attack] will be wider than simply an act of terrorism against Jews," Stavroulakis told me. "Already it is being seen in a much wider social context that has to do with civic responsibility and care."

Schneider having fun playing the game in Mooseland

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — My late mother, Sarah, used to tell a story in Yiddish of a king stopping a commoner in the street and asking him where he was going. The latter refused to answer, and before long, the king warned him that he would be jailed if he didn't co-operate. Steadfast in his convictions, the commoner again declined and was summarily locked up.

Days later, the king, still curious, visited him in his cell and said if he would only explain why he refused to answer such a simple question he would immediately be set free. At that juncture, the man explained it was improper to lie to his highness because when someone sets out to go somewhere, he never really knows if he will ever arrive. "I was only going to the butcher shop to buy some bones to make a chicken soup for my family," he said. "How was I to know I would end up in jail?"

I thought of my mother's fable in early January when the Manitoba Moose received a belated Chanukah present. Jewish defenceman Mathieu Schneider, whose prime goal was to play in Vancouver, unexpectedly ended up in Winnipeg.

Last summer, Schneider became an unrestricted free agent following a split season between Montreal and Atlanta. He allegedly had a half-dozen offers in the off-season to sign a one-year contract with a new NHL team. The 40-year-old, who has played with nine different clubs under the big top, noted when he signed a $1.5-million (US) pact, that Vancouver was far and away his preferred choice for him, his wife, Shannon and their four kids. Being a good family man, chosing Vancouver was a slam dunk. At least it appeared that way.

Schneider worked all summer rehabilitating his injured shoulder, and was prepared to use his considerable skills as the quarterback on the Canucks' powerplay. He appeared to be a perfect match for the Canucks. After all, the NHL veteran's point totals (223 goals and 516 assists) resemble those of a decent forward rather than a defenceman.

Well, something went wrong on the way to the butcher shop. It appears Schneider didn't see eye-to-eye with former Moose head coach Alain Vigneault in Vancouver, and the rearguard, a veteran of 1,281 regular season NHL games, didn't see much ice time either. Spending 25 of 42 games as a scratch created the kind of itch that can lead to unpleasant dialogue between employee and management. And it did.

Reports from the West Coast media explained that Schneider left the team on Dec.

New Moose Mathieu Schneider

18, was put on waivers, and nary an NHL team went for the bait. Was it because of his salary, or the feeling he doesn't have much to offer at the price? Or perhaps it was thought he could be had at a bargain-basement price at the March 3 trade deadline.

When, upon his arrival, Schneider appeared at a press conference at the MTS Centre in Winnipeg where the Moose play, he was all smiles. There were queries of course and, not surprisingly, more information was sought about his latest interactions with Canucks' management than how his presence might help the Moose track down the division-leading Hamilton Bulldogs.

But Schneider was diplomatic. "I just want to have some fun, get out there and play the game I love. That's pretty much it," he said.

From most reports, his marriage with the Canucks ended when Schneider was not prepared to accept Vigneault's role for him, which was more limited than the ex-NHLer wanted. The head coach also reportedly stated he has no interest in having Schneider return to his club – a remark that is especially poignant since Kevin Bieksa, a former Moose defender, is now a badly injured Canuck and won't likely suit up again for at least two months.

Should matters deteriorate along the Canucks' blueline, there is always the likelihood of a red alert, and player and coach may hug and make up for the good of the team. In short, the most talented defenceman seen in these parts since 1995 when the Jets were kidnapped to Phoenix may have a fairly limited stay in Winnipeg.

Of all the Jewish players who used to come to town during Winnipeg's exposure to the NHL, Schneider is the one with whom I am most familiar. I would talk with him in the visiting team's dressing room when he played for the Canadiens and the Islanders between 1989 and 1995.

He talked about his ethnic background and how he related to other Jewish players in the league, namely Calgary's tough guy Ron Stern, Chicago's Steve Dubinsky, Steve Richmond of the LA Kings, and enforcer Mike Hartman of the Jets. He conceded there was a bond that they shared.

Synagogue on the High Holidays was important to his family and something that his own father stressed as important.

Hopefully, Schneider will get what he no doubt wants most, and that's a return to the NHL – if not with the Canucks then with another team that requires the contributions of a skilled and savvy player who can still blast them from the point on the powerplay and teach the rookies how to play the game.

It would be a surprise if the highest-scoring Jewish player in the history of the game will find himself celebrating Passover in late March in Mooseland.

Braun, Feldman named 2009 'Jewish MVPs' in MLB

Compiled by CJN Staff

NEWTON, Mass. — Ryan Braun and Scott Feldman have been named the most valuable Jewish players of the year by Jewish Major Leaguers, Inc. (JML), the not-for-profit baseball history organization that produces Jewish baseball cards and Hall of Fame programs honouring Jews in the game.

The 2009 position player of the year is Braun, the slugging left-fielder for the Milwaukee Brewers. Braun's .319 batting average and 32 homers were tops among Jewish players, and his 203 hits led the National League in that category – a first in Jewish baseball history.

Braun's father is an Israeli-born Jew.

JML's choice as pitcher of the year is Texas Rangers right-hander Feldman. In his fifth season and second as a starter, Feldman went 17-8, with a 4.08 ERA. His 17 wins were the most for a Jewish starter since Steve Stone of Baltimore in 1980.

The JML awards tradition began last season when the winners were Red Sox infielder Kevin Youkilis and Pirates reliever John Grabow.

JML is currently conducting online balloting for Jewish major leaguer of the decade at www.jewishmajorleaguers.org. The winning player will be announced in January.

Braun and Feldman will be featured on a special card in the 2010 edition of Jewish Major Leaguer cards, to be released in the spring.

Jewish Major Leaguers Inc. is an organization dedicated to furthering education on the contributions of Jews to baseball through card products and seminars. The group is headquartered in Newton, Mass., and is headed by Martin Abramowitz, a leading authority on the subject and creator of the concept, which led to the first set of cards, featuring all Jewish players in history, released in 2003.

New CD reflects a love of the Yiddish language

By CYNTHIA GASNER

Sam Hoffer, a retired management consultant, loves Yiddish, and his new CD is an expression of his fondness for his mamaloshen.

The five tales on Hoffer's recently released S'helft Nisht Keyn Krekhtsn! (There's No Use Complaining!) mirror the dilemmas we face in everyday life. Hoffer says that humour makes his CD enjoyable for those who speak fluent Yiddish as well as for those who love the language but speak it only haltingly.

COMICAL TALES OF MODERN-DAY LIFE

The cover of Sam Hoffer's Yiddish CD, There's No Use Complaining

The diverse topics on the CD reflect on a senior's experience in trying to tackle the use of a computer, the myths surrounding working for the government, neighbourly competition and shopping in a modern-day mall.

Hoffer says it took two years to write the original script and record and produce it. "But," he adds, "the genesis of this CD goes back much farther to Czernowitz, Romania, where I was born in 1945."

Son of survivors of the Shargorod concentration camp in Transnistria, he says that Yiddish was the only language the family spoke until the family immigrated to Canada when he was seven years old.

"We settled in Hoffer, Sask., a frontier Prairie farming community founded in the early 1900s by our distant relatives."

As immigrants from eastern Europe, he says, everyone in the farming community spoke Yiddish except when dealing with the broader community.

"Yiddish was the first language of the settlement, and the use of Yiddish at home and among those in our village gave me an exceptional exposure to the use of Yiddish in all of its facets."

Over the years, Hoffer listened to Yiddish records or saw Yiddish films, and "I increasingly appreciated how expressive the language is," he says.

"Two years ago, I listened to an old video of Yiddish comedians Dzigan and Shumacher, and the next morning, I began writing my first tale in my mamaloshen."

He says the inspiration for the Yiddish CD came from knowing that although the shtetl of eastern Europe is gone, Yiddish remains magical in its ability to capture its humour and its foibles.

As a youngster on the family's farm, as a college student studying economics, as a management consultant and now as a retiree, "one of my most rewarding experiences has been the production of my CD," he says.

"It is very gratifying to me that so many individuals and organizations have responded so enthusiastically."

There's No Use Complaining! is available at major book stores in Toronto and on Hoffer's website, yiddishstories.com.

About Life

Dear Ella,

Like so many others, I decided this year I would lose those extra pounds. I am getting older and my BMI is sitting firmly in the overweight category. For both health and vanity reasons, I need to make it work this time.

I was well on my way to a new healthier lifestyle when I noticed little things that my husband was doing to sabotage my diet. Josh is thin regardless of what he eats. We used to dine out all the time, but I have chosen to eat in more often and that bothers him. On one hand he tells me I'm looking great, but at the same time, he's encouraging me to eat that second helping or bringing me a treat. I'm not sure why he does this, or that he even realizes that he is, but it's making my goals much harder, and I'm beginning to resent it. I don't want to bring it up and seem petty or insensitive. What should I do?

Feeling Sabotaged

Dear Feeling Sabotaged

Congratulations on making the decision to get leaner and healthier this year. Changing old habits can be hard and requires mental preparation. You've probably been thinking about this lifestyle change for a while now. Even though you've made this decision, Josh hasn't had that mental head start. He may never understand what it takes to succeed in weight loss, as it's not something he has ever had to deal with. He may be happy with you just the way you are and feel this is an unnecessary intrusion on your lives together.

Although you're motivated to make changes and give up old patterns that the two of you shared, Josh isn't emotionally prepared for this. However, it's your body, your health and your life, and you'll often come across difficult situations along the way. Having your spouse on board can be a major key to your success. Since you spend much of your time together (meals, social situations, etc.), it's important for you to make Josh part of your journey. Discuss your feelings and let him discuss his.

Communication is never petty. Tell him what you need from him for you to succeed. Involve him, and he will benefit automatically from a healthier lifestyle, as well. Replace your dining out together with movies, walks or sports.

Making Josh a partner in your goals will create many rewards you can both celebrate together.

What would you include in your 'wheel of life'?

What will you do to find your bliss in 2010? What would make you happier, more fulfilled and deeply satisfied in the coming year?

I often ask people to break it down into the different areas in their lives: career, money, health and fitness, family, friends, significant other, personal growth and spirituality, fun and recreation, and your environment. The resulting "wheel of life" is a marvellous springboard. So, go through those areas and do a little checklist. Ask yourself how satisfied you are with each area on a scale from one to 10, and then choose the area you know needs the most work. For instance, if you have a four in health and fitness, ask yourself what you need to do to turn this area into a 10!

Life Coach Corner
By JUDY SIBLIN-LIBRACH

You'd be amazed at how just asking the question will elicit all sorts of exciting responses. Write them down. Talk them out with a friend or loved one.

Ask yourself what you could start doing to regain balance in your life And what could you stop doing or delegate to others to create more space in your life?

I love a wheel of life that looks at values, and if I were drawing my "finding your bliss" wheel, it would also have a section for each of these categories: putting more love in your heart; an act of kindness; patience; how to create calm and quiet in the busy day; volunteering or giving; keeping in touch with friends and seeing them more often (schedule lunches and coffees to catch up); health, nutrition and fitness for your family; your primary relationship and how to make more time for it (mini-honeymoons, vacations, candlelit dinners); spending more time with each child; and fulfilment and "bliss," where you are taking steps every day toward your purpose and your greatest passion.

What would your wheel of life look like if you were drawing a circle with eight or nine wedges in it, like pieces of a pie? I'd love to hear from you. Write to me about what you will do find your bliss in the coming year. But here are a few ideas to get you started:

• Every day is a new day. Don't trip yourself if you haven't started the diet or fitness program yet, just start right now. And if you have a day where you fall off the wagon, be gentle with yourself and start over. It's never too late.

• Stay in a place of gratitude and be aware of all your blessings. You can't say thank you enough, and I recommend the exercise of writing down five things you are grateful for every night before you go to bed and teaching your kids to say their five things before they go to bed at night.

• Stay connected to who you really are and be genuine in all you do.

• Stay connected to what really jazzes you and make time for the thing you love in addition to kids, your relationship and work.

• Stay cool, find the quiet corner in your day over morning coffee, do some breathing, yoga or meditation, or even just close your eyes for a few moments in your day and remain quiet.

• Find the humour in every situation whenever possible. Charles M. Schulz once said: "Sometimes I lie awake at night and ask, 'Where have I gone wrong?' Then a voice says to me, 'This is going to take more than one night.'"

Happy New Year, everyone! Hope it's a great one for you!

IDF field hospital in Haiti 'overwhelmed'

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

When Dr. Ofer Merin and his medical team arrived in Haiti, they were met by hundreds of patients.

Some had chest injuries, others had open wounds, but one thing was clear.

"If they're not treated, they'll die," Merin, the chief of the Israel Defence Forces field hospital in Haiti, said in an exclusive phone interview from Port-au-Prince, Haiti.

Merin is in charge of some 120 IDF nurses, physicians and medics, one of the largest medical units in Haiti at this time. His unit arrived in Port-au-Prince, Haiti's capital, three days after the country was hit by the strongest earthquake it has experienced in 200 years.

The death count in Haiti has yet to be finalized. The European Union estimates that it's reached 200,000 since the earthquake struck on Jan. 12, with two million left homeless.

Merin's team left Israel on Jan. 15.

"We had meetings all day [Jan. 13]. The preliminary plan was I'd fly with an army plane to Haiti the same night… Then [the IDF] decided to send a big medical mission," he said.

Merin's medical team was joined by about 120 rescue workers on the 14-hour flight to Haiti. They landed in Port-au-Prince on the afternoon of Jan. 15, but had to wait for a separate cargo plane packed with medical equipment to arrive before setting up the field hospital.

"The cargo plane landed at four in the morning, [and] we started to build up the hospital. By 10 a.m. [Jan. 16], we received the first patients," Merin said.

In conjunction with the Central Arava Regional Council, the JNF is planting thousands of Acacia trees in the desert area of the Negev. Acacias are a characteristic feature of the Arava region. They form a unique, beautiful savanna desert landscape and constitute the basis for a rich and important ecological system that's not seen elsewhere in the world. [JNF/KKL photos]

The News in Brief

Canada

Body Found In Case

MONTREAL — Montreal police found the body of an Israeli man inside a suitcase Jan. 16 after a passerby noticed a foot sticking out of the case, which had been left in the snow on a downtown street. Several hours after the discovery, Eran Allon's partner, Michael-Andrew Garreau, 33, of Ottawa, turned himself in to Ottawa police and said he killed Allon, 29. He was charged with second-degree murder. The couple reportedly clashed about Allon's reluctance to return to Israel.

Manslaughter Plea

OTTAWA — A guilty plea to manslaughter made last week by the man who robbed and killed Ottawa's Terry Schwarzfeld, head of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO, on a Barbados beach last year is "a little low," her sister says. "He tried to rob them, left, and then came back after them. It sounds more like second-degree [murder] to me," Joan Schwarzfeld told the Ottawa Citizen. Schwarzfeld, 60, and daughter-in-law Luana Cotsman, of Guelph, were beaten unconscious Feb. 28 while walking on a beach after a man tried to rob them. Cotsman recovered, but Schwarzfeld later died in Ottawa. Curtis Joel Foster, 25, who was already in jail for other robberies on the same beach, faced robbery and murder charges in the case. He'll be sentenced Feb. 17.

Educators Meet

TEANECK, N.J. — A delegation of 31 senior educators from Canada joined some 570 of their U.S. counterparts in Teaneck, N.J., last week for the first-ever Jewish Day School Leadership Conference. The Canadians hailed from schools or boards in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Calgary and Vancouver. The three-day event welcomed schools of all denominations and examined "21st-century challenges" such as "economic uncertainties, government funding, demographic changes and teacher retention" as well as "opportunities" such as "technology in classrooms, Jewish service learning, and social media to build educational communities."

Gehry Withdraws

JERUSALEM — Award-winning Canadian architect Frank Gehry has withdrawn from the project to build a Museum of Tolerance in Jerusalem. Ha'aretz reported Gehry was leaving the Simon Wiesenthal Center project amid controversy that the museum was to be built on the site of a former Muslim cemetery. The withdrawal is not related to protests over the site, the paper reported, citing the project's architecture team as saying Gehry resigned over a request by the centre to reduce the plan's scope as well as financial disagreements. The museum is being built on a former parking lot that wasn't being used as part of the cemetery, the centre asserts. Americans for Peace Now applauded Gehry's decision to withdraw, saying it offers "a wonderful face-saving opportunity – a chance to change course and come up with a new plan on a new site."

Tfillin Scare On Plane

NEW YORK — A commercial flight was diverted to Philadelphia after a Jewish passenger's tfillin were mistaken for a bomb. A passenger on a Jan. 21 US Airways flight from New York to Louisville reportedly made the error after the Jewish passenger, 17, took his tfillin out to pray. Passengers and crew were taken off the plane in Philadelphia. Firetrucks and police met it on the runway. The teen was questioned and released. No one was arrested in the incident.

Questions Irk Gibson

LOS ANGELES — Mel Gibson and a Jewish broadcaster sparred over the actor's anti-Semitic rant in 2006. In a recent interview, Gibson became irritated when Sam Rubin of Los Angeles television station KTLA asked about anti-Semitic remarks Gibson made during his arrest that year on suspicion of drunken driving. A Jewish police officer had pulled over the actor. Gibson is promoting a new movie. After Gibson bristled at Rubin's questions about the comments, he asked the reporter, in an allusion to his being Jewish, "I gather you have a dog in this fight? Do you have a dog in this fight? Or are you impartial?" The interview continued without incident after Rubin changed the direction of his questions. Gibson reportedly became aggressive during his 2006 arrest and then said, "F—ng Jews – Jews are responsible for all the wars in the world." He also reportedly asked the arresting officer if he was Jewish. He later apologized.

Teacher Transferred

LAS VEGAS —A Las Vegas gym teacher who reportedly denied the Holocaust in front of her students was reassigned to a new school. Lori Sublette, a teacher at the Northwest Career and Technical Academy, was shifted from the high school to a middle school in the city. The school district reportedly didn't give a reason for the transfer. She had been working at home while getting salary and benefits since the November incident as the school district investigated.

Survivor Testifies

MUNICH — A survivor testifying at the war crimes trial of accused Nazi death camp guard John Demjanjuk said he didn't recall seeing Demjanjuk at Sobibor. The court heard Jan. 19 from Thomas Blatt, 82, one of the few remaining survivors of the death camp. Blatt, who lost his family there, recounted many details about his months at the camp until he escaped in a prisoner uprising in October 1942. He said he couldn't remember seeing Demjanjuk there. Demjanjuk, 89, is being tried in Germany as an accessory to the murder of 27,900 Jews at Sobibor in 1943. Prosecutors say they will present hard evidence that he was a guard there. Blatt said all guards there were accomplices to murder.

Conflict Harming Universities, Report Says

OTTAWA — The Israeli-Palestinian conflict has harmed university education and academic freedom in the West Bank, Gaza and Israel, a Canadian-authored study alleges.

The report, conducted by the Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT), says Israel's restrictions on travel in the West Bank and Gaza create an insurmountable hurdle for students and infringe upon scholarly pursuits there, frustrating hopes for a regional peace.

"Both Israeli and Palestinian academics are facing greater pressure from outside political influences and from within the academy itself," according to the report, which adds that there are "clear and consistent violations of internationally recognized academic rights" as set out in United Nations agreements.

The 68-page report was released earlier this month by the CAUT group and Education International, a Belgian-based global federation representing more than 30 million educators in 172 countries and territories. The CAUT represents more than 67,000 academic and general staff at colleges and universities across Canada.

A summary of the study on the CAUT's website states that many academics face arbitrary arrest and detention by both Israeli and Palestinian authorities. But it also cites the violence between Palestinian factions for leaving university workers "caught in the crossfire of the fighting between Hamas and Fatah."

The report also claims Israeli universities face swelling class sizes due to a brain drain, since academics have left Israel as salaries haven't kept pace with the country's 31 per cent inflation since 1997, partly because state resources must be diverted to security.

Shuls across Canada mark 'Darfur Shabbat'

Annual event overshadowed by disaster in Haiti

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Last week, congregations in at least 12 Jewish communities across the country were preparing for Canadian Jewish Congress' "Darfur Shabbat," which took place this past weekend.

Had organizers known that it would take place so soon after the Jan. 12 earthquake in Haiti, they would have planned differently, Rabbi Reuven Bulka said in a phone interview from his office at Congregation Machzikei Hadas, an Orthodox synagogue in Ottawa. He noted that CJC has sent mass e-mails about earthquake relief efforts to the Jewish community, which has "geared up" to help the survivors.

However, Rabbi Bulka added, plans for Darfur Shabbat were in the works for months, and the genocide in Sudan's Darfur region represents "an ongoing humanitarian issue… that hasn't been front and centre.

"We're talking over half a million who have been killed," said Rabbi Bulka, immediate past CJC co-chair.

The rabbi joined his Conservative colleague Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation and Reform Rabbi Philip Bregman of Temple Sholom in Vancouver to encourage their fellow rabbis to participate in Darfur Shabbat.

"Remaining silent in the face of the Darfur genocide would be to deny Judaism's core concept of not standing idly by while others suffer," they stated in a news release.

As of last Thursday, CJC knew of participating congregations in Victoria, Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton, Winnipeg, London, Hamilton, Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal, Fredericton and St. John's.

As well, said Benjamin Shinewald, the organization's national executive director and general counsel, "students have picked this up with some gusto. There are services and Shabbat programming at Hillels and Jewish student associations across the country."

Rabbi Reuven Bulka

Rabbi Bulka said he and his colleagues would "urge people to write to their MPs, so hopefully Darfur will get back on the radar screen [and] be addressed" through international pressure that "so people there can live in peace."

When reached last Thursday, the rabbi was planning to talk about Darfur in his sermon on Saturday, highlighting the connection Jews have to suffering. "The Torah reading of the week deals with the agonizing suffering we went through in Egypt, and the beginning of redemption."

As well, he added, "I won't hesitate to say that the fact we reacted as we did to what happened in Haiti showed how caring we are as Jews and as Canadians."

Amichai (Ami) Wise, a 32-year-old Ottawa lawyer, is chair of CJC's Darfur action committee, which has been revitalized in the past year and now has almost 40 members.

Together for a good purpose

From the editor's desk...

Some time ago, educator, scholar, archeologist Alex Gropper alerted readers of his CJN column to the fact that he had begun the process of organizing a conference on olive oil in the Mediterranean.

The conference is not intended to be a Food Channel entrée, Gropper made clear. Rather, it will explore the importance of the olive in the evolution of Mediterranean history and culture. The subject is neither esoteric nor abstract.

Many aspects of Jewish and western culture and values originate in the Mediterranean basin. Gropper wondered whether there are any common historical threads from around the basin that tie the diverse countries of the area together today? To what extent are the olive and the highly significant ancillary olive oil industry one of those threads?

The Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies at St. Michael's College of the University of Toronto is one of the sponsors of the conference. However, since he formulated the idea, Gropper's plans have expanded.

The conference, to be co-chaired by Gropper and Prof. Domenico Pietropaolo, chair of Italian studies at U of T, will now be the first part of a two-part olive oil project. The second part will be an exhibit at the Royal Ontario Museum (ROM).

Building upon the excitement and the success of the recently concluded Dead Sea Scrolls exhibition, the ROM eagerly seized the opportunity to present an exhibition on the impact of the olive on the cultures of the Mediterranean basin.

Gropper told The CJN that it was only after the personal involvement of Dimitris Azemopoulos, Greek consul for Ontario and Manitoba, that "things really began to move" on the project. "The olive and olive oil unite all of us who share a Mediterranean background," Gropper said.

He and Azemopoulos hope to use the conference and exhibition "as a way of bringing people together, whether they be of Jewish, Christian or Muslim heritage."

With Gropper's intriguing articulation of so eminently laudable an enterprise, I decided to meet the diplomat whom Gropper enthusiastically endorsed and whose involvement is essential to ensure the project actually happens.

The Greek consulate on Bloor Street East in Toronto is a very busy place. This comes as no surprise, since approximately 250,000 people of Greek origin live in the Greater Toronto Area.

Azemopoulos greeted me effusively and warmly. He smiled broadly. His deeply set, dark brown eyes were part of the smile.

After merely the briefest of introductory comments, it was apparent that though he is a diplomat by function, Azemopoulos is a professor, pastor, theologian by nature.

"The epitome of a diplomat is to be a visionary of a better world," he told me. "We must find common denominators that unite us. This is the essence and quintessence of a human being."

Dimitris Azemopoulos

His message struck particularly deep. The previous day, a monstrous earthquake had struck Haiti. Stark, heartbreaking images of disaster dominated every news medium. The reports emanating from Port-Au-Prince were gruesome and discouraging.

"Seeing the tragedy and massive disaster in Haiti," the consul suggested, "should help us become unstuck from our micro worlds.

"We have to help them to have the courage to go forward," he said.

The consul may sound more like a priest than a foreign service envoy, but he is not to be mistaken for someone untrained in the subtleties, nuances and negotiations of the diplomatic world.

The 48-year-old served for a number of years in the European Union headquarters in Brussels. Prior to his current posting, he served in Norway. He studied at the Sorbonne and in London and speaks several languages.

His empathy for the suffering in Haiti springs from a more profound source than the sorrowful images on the television. In recent times, he told me, "everyone whom I loved, died in my arms." He was referring to both parents and his sister.

Rather than succumb to the self-pity or cynical nihilism that could so easily have accompanied his own personal tragedies, he found inspiration in his faith and purpose in trying to express himself in ways that help others move forward.

"How can we make our world happier?" he asked me rhetorically. "If I could put just one stone [in the structure] of making people feel happier, this would matter to me a great deal."

He then explained how his collaboration with Gropper ties in with his view of life in general and with his vision for the role of a diplomat specifically.

"The olive oil exhibit will include as many Mediterranean countries as possible to give a very clear signal to the people of this community that we can all come together for good purposes."

I understood immediately why his participation in the olive oil event was so important to the consul personally, and essential to the overall success of the project. I look forward to it. It will likely teach us a great deal.

Alon Fisher, inset, who was injured in the Second Lebanon War, speaks to Israel Defence Forces soldiers about his experience.

Former IDF soldier helps youth connect with Israel

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Alon Fisher lost his eye in the Second Lebanon War. But he never lost his faith.

Fisher, then 22, was a commander in the Israel Defence Forces (IDF). On the last day of the war, he was leading several of his soldiers toward a small village in Lebanon when a grenade was thrown at them.

"The grenade exploded five metres from us… I just could do one thing, and it was to yell that we're hit," he said in a telephone interview from Israel.

Fisher, who was in front of his soldiers, felt the full force of the explosion. One of the other troops, who wasn't hit, pulled him to safety.

"He ran at me, he grabbed me in my vest and grabbed me a few metres behind. That was how he saved my life," Fisher said, adding that a doctor was there to help.

"They saw all my face was bleeding and my legs and arms were bleeding. My left leg got lots of shrapnel and also the right side of my face. One of the shrapnel came into my right eye and took it out of place."

Shrapnel also got into his brain, Fisher, said.

But the most difficult part of the day was yet to come. Fisher and his troops had to walk 40 minutes through enemy fire to get to a helicopter that would take them to Haifa. Unable to walk, Fisher was carried.

"You need to understand. For me to be a commander – and now you're lying down and all your soldiers need to carry you… It's a very big risk my soldiers took to save me."

When he got to Haifa, Fisher, now 25, spent 11 hours in surgery. Doctors saved his leg, but couldn't save his eye.

"I have glass in the eye. I can't see in the right eye. But thank God, after a very long rehabilitation, I can walk," he said.

To this day, Fisher still has bits of shrapnel in his brain. But he has continued to thank God.

"[God] doesn't give a person a thing that he can't deal with," he said. "Nobody will come to me and… say, 'You need to sacrifice your son,' but they will come and say, 'You need to deal with rehab.'"

And he did. Fisher spent some eight months in rehab, learning to walk again.

"I think that, at the start, it was very difficult… You had questions. Why me? Why should this happen?" he said. "I think it's made me stronger."

After he was discharged from the hospital in Haifa, Fisher moved home to Tel Aviv to continue rehab. After his rehab sessions, he started attending classes at Yeshivat Tel Aviv Maale Eliyahu.

"One of my friends was learning at the yeshiva when I was in rehab. He said maybe I can come learn with him at night," Fisher said.

The former soldier instantly felt at home. "I felt very connected… it was very nice for me," he said.

Now, Fisher helps out at the yeshiva, whose main goal is to help connect Tel Aviv's secular Jews to their heritage through outreach programs. The organization runs initiatives including the Reut Center, which offers Jewish identity programs to elementary and high school students, and the Family Center, which offers premarital advice for Jewish couples.

While Fisher can no longer serve in the IDF, he still gives lectures to soldiers through the yeshiva.

"You know that now 40 per cent of the youth in Israel don't want to go to the army? It's horrible," he said, adding that this is because youth are losing their connection to their country. "Because why should they [serve in the IDF]? Why should I now take three years of my life and give them away?"

For Fisher, the answer to this problem is simple.

"If you know the meaning of the army, the connection to Israel… will be strong. They'll say OK, it's a very big price, but it's a price I need to pay."

Fisher continues to tell his story in hopes that he'll inspire others to understand that connection.

When thinking back to that day in Lebanon, one thing is clear. "If I had a chance to do it again, I would," he said.

During the week of Feb. 3, he will be visiting Toronto with members of his yeshiva to speak to youth about the importance of maintaining a Jewish identity.

Of Darfur...

Shabbat services this past weekend in countless synagogues across the country were dedicated to recalling the ongoing genocide and depredations in Darfur. Rabbis of all streams and denominations called upon their congregants to act on behalf of the forsaken of Darfur. For forsaken, alas, they remain.

Since 2003, the Janjaweed militia of Sudan has been slaughtering the black African tribes in Darfur. Some 400,000 men, women and children have died. A further 2 million people have fled their homes

It is imperative, though difficult given the clutter of our lives and the inversion of our values, that we try to recall the suffering in Darfur every day. But there was a particular poignancy to such a communal and individual effort this past Shabbat.

It preceded by four days the 65th anniversary of the liberation of the death camp at Auschwitz and Birkenau. Indeed Jan. 27 has since been set aside in much of the Western world, including in Canada, as a Holocaust remembrance day.

Rabbi Howard Morrison of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation in Toronto pointedly expressed the issue last Shabbat when he asked his congregants: "If we lament that almost no one stood up for our people in eastern Europe, then what do we say now, when almost no one is standing up for the poor and innocent of Darfur?"

Even though other life-affirming, life-saving, existentially vital causes also call to our consciences, the organizers of this past Shabbat's special dedication to Darfur starkly remind us that "remaining silent in the face of the Darfur genocide would be to deny Judaism's core concept of not standing idly by while others suffer."

The Canadian Jewish Congress has reminded us that we must take a stand on Darfur and not be swayed away from it until the genocide stops. They are to be commended for doing so.

...and Haiti

Also to be commended for the breadth and immediacy of their ongoing response to the incomprehensible grief in Haiti are our communal organizations and the individuals now on the ground in Haiti. Jewish federations across the country, United Israel Appeal of Canada, and social action agencies such as Ve'ahavta, B'nai Brith Canada, Magen David Adom and others exemplarize the values – caring and compassion, not standing idly by while others suffer, extending a helping hand – that have been the hallmark of Jewish peoplehood and survival.

And as so many have pointed out, the work of the Israeli search, rescue and medical teams, partly in conjunction with the open-hearted response of our communal organizations, has sparkled in the gloom and chaos of Haiti, saving a great many lives.

For such is the proper and appropriate thing to do.

Frank Miller defeated fellow longtime Ontario cabinet minister Larry Grossman on the third ballot of the Ontario Progressive Conservative leadership convention. Had he won, Grossman would have become the first Jewish premier in Ontario history. He later became PC leader and leader of the Opposition after Miller resigned when his new minority government was defeated in the legislature by a coalition of Liberals and New Democrats.

Why can't we all get along?

The recent public display of animosity in a public forum by one rabbinic group against another pains me greatly. We have always been a unified community with respect and care for one another. For one organization to use an individual and his alleged misdeeds to taint another organization is a low blow and not the Jewish way.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko in a guest voice wrote: "In Montreal, we get along… even our rabbis get along. We are deeply reluctant to criticize each other publicly" ("We're different here in Montreal," Montreal edition, Oct. 8). These words unfortunately didn't prevent Rabbi Poupko, along with other rabbis from the Rabbinical Council of Canada, from publicly criticizing the Vaad Ha'ir as being a divisive force here in our community. ("Orthodox conversion dispute goes public," Jan. 14). The Talmud in Sanhedrin says that those who won't let go of an argument transgress a negative commandment of the Torah ("Do not be like Korach and his congregation"). I personally know Rabbi Saul Emanuel, executive director of the Vaad, to be a man of principle and believe him when he states that there is no dispute. If both organizations work l'shem shamayim (for the sake of heaven) and adhere to Torah laws, then there should be no argument.

Montreal has always been known as a city where everyone respected one another and got along. We might have had our disagreements, but we always tried to work them out among the parties involved. Sadly, that has now changed. Do we wonder why Mashiach hasn't come yet?

A proud secular Jew

I am alarmed that Rabbi Dow Marmur refers to Judaism in North America as "self-centred and idiosyncratic" in his column "Me-Jews or We-Jews" (Jan. 7). I do not doubt the sincerity with which he writes. I think living in Israel and living in Canada is remarkably different. When I visited Israel as part of the Birthright program, my faith in Judaism and my commitment to the Jewish community was reinvigorated. And yet, I do not feel the need to follow Halachah. I do not think that my valuing my "spirituality" is a cop-out.

I am a proud secular Jew. What Rabbi Marmur seems to disavow is the sanctity of the individual over and against the collective. I live every day of my life as Michael Helfield, Jew. What this means to me, and how I negotiate my individuality with my role in the Jewish community of Montreal is my own decision. Next to Hillel, I think the wisest Jew I know is my father, Naaman Helfield, whose "live and let live" arguments should perhaps be heard by more Jews and more rabbis. Be they from the haredi, Reconstructionist or secular communities, I respect the individual's natural right to define on their own authority how they decide to be a part of Judaism.

I think Rabbi Marmur has unwittingly expressed a "straw man" logical fallacy: North American culture is materialistic and hungry to assimilate the religious and the devout. Josephus was a devout Jew, a priest, a descendant of the Hasmoneans, and highly knowledgeable in Jewish law. And yet he became a Roman citizen and wrote in Greek. While this might not be everyone's cup of tea, Josephus was able to live in Rome without sacrificing the care he felt for his people and their history. I am like Josephus, a complex man who chooses and defines how he connects to the Jewish community.

Pope Pius' beatification

As a child survivor from Slovakia, I am terribly shocked to hear that the Catholic church proposes that Pope Pius XII be made a saint ("Jew ask Vatican to reconsider Pope Pius' beatification," Toronto, Jan. 14). He was the man who allowed and supported Bishop Jozef Tiso to rule Slovakia during World War II. Bishop Tiso persecuted Jews and got paid by the Germans for deporting them to Auschwitz and other concentration camps. Bishop Tiso also punished Catholic Slovaks who helped Jews. My family was among the Jews saved by Catholic Slovaks. Pope Pius obviously knew what Bishop Tiso was doing and did not protest. Does that make him a saint?

Committee's letter is timid, bland

If the best the Canada-Israel Committee can do on the arrest of women attempting to pray at the permitted section of the Western Wall is a timid and bland two-sentence letter to the editor ("Access to Israel's holy sites," Jan 21) reaffirming its view "that the pluralistic nature of Israel is an essential value that characterizes the Jewish state" and that "there must be equal access to Israel's holy sites," then the Canada-Israel Committee would have been well advised to say nothing rather than insult a significant segment of your readership and embarrass itself in the process.

Delegitimizers threaten existence of Jewish state

By GIDI GRINSTEIN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

A year after Operation Cast Lead, it is increasingly clear: together with the Second Lebanon War in 2006, the Gaza campaign exposed a dire need for Israel to reform its security and foreign policy doctrine.

Many Israelis are frustrated. Over a three-year period, despite overwhelming military, technological and economic superiority, we failed to achieve decisive successes in confrontations with both Hezbollah and Hamas. In 2006, Israel was dragged through a 33-day exchange, with a cost of 133 dead and a trauma to Israeli society that will take years to heal. And in last year's Gaza operation, our superior military power was offset by an offensive on Israel's legitimacy that led to a significant setback in our international standing, and will constrain future Israeli military planning and operations as effectively as any Arab army could. This is a scorecard Israel can't afford to accept.

Israel's wars are won, or lost, as much on the drawing boards of strategists and planners as on the battlefield. In its first 20 years of existence, Israel had remarkable military successes, but, notwithstanding the bravery of our soldiers, they were primarily the outcome of an intellectual victory in the war of ideas and concepts. David Ben-Gurion's 1947 "seminar," by which he prepared himself for leading the nascent state in an existential military confrontation, generated a set of principles for Israeli national security, many of which are relevant today. By 1967, it was secure in its borders.

In the more than four decades since then, Israel's physical existence has been an unchallenged reality, even if at times its citizens have been subjected to terrorism and violence. Arab intentions to destroy Israel were repeatedly frustrated, to a point where any such effort was effectively abandoned, and Egypt and Jordan signed peace treaties with Israel. Even though Iran may grow into an existential threat, Israel's successes to date have been truly phenomenal.

Frustrated by Israel's military might, its adversaries – primarily Iran and its Arab allies in Hezbollah and Hamas – have experimented with politics and violence in their attempt to cap our power and diminish it. Over time, they were able to crystallize a set of ideas that have proven effective. Rather than seeking to conquer Israel, they would aim to bring about its implosion, as with South Africa or the Soviet Union, by attacking its political and economic values. While Israel aims to avoid civilian casualties, they systematically involve civilians on both sides of the frontier. While Israel seeks decisive "victory" in direct confrontations, they value "resistance" and low-intensity conflict.

Turning Israel into a pariah state is central to its adversaries' efforts. Israel is a geopolitical island. Its survival and prosperity depend on its relations with the world in trade, science, arts and culture – all of which rely on its legitimacy. When the latter is compromised, the former may be severed, with harsh political, social and economic consequences.

The transformative change taking place stems from an unholy alliance with some European elites. The radical, brutal, sometimes fascist Islamic states and organizations that reject Israel share aims with Europeans that deny the right of Jews to self-determination.

And so, our politicians and military personnel are threatened with lawsuits and arrest when they travel abroad, campaigns to boycott our products gain traction, and our very existence is challenged in academic institutions and intellectual circles. The country is increasingly isolated.

To date, Israel has failed to recognize these trends for the strategically significant, potentially existential, threat they constitute. It has mustered neither resources nor personnel to fight them, and lacks a comprehensive approach to the challenge.

Many frame the problem as one of public relations, as if what's required is a task force of eloquent speakers who can deliver a three-point punch line in polished English in 30 seconds. This may have been useful in the early days of global news, 20 years ago. Today, it is insufficient.

Others say that Israel's policy is key, and that a genuine and credible commitment to the peace process will decrease both criticism and delegitimization of the country. But the delegitimization effort would continue even if Israel were to sign a comprehensive peace treaty with the Palestine Liberation Organization. Indeed, the forces that drive this effort are not Palestinian moderates, but rather people who oppose Israel's very existence. An agreement would only fuel their campaign to converge around the next outstanding issue that comes up between Israel and the Arab world.

Israel's delegitimacy is propagated in a few global metropolises – such as London, Madrid and the Bay Area in San Francisco – that are hubs of international NGOs, media outlets, academia and multinational corporations. Therefore, an extraordinary effort is required to respond to and isolate Israel's delegitimizers. We must play offence and not just defence.

The most effective barrier to fundamental delegitimization is personal relationships. In every major country, Israel and its supporters must develop and sustain personal connections with the entire elite in business, politics, arts and culture, science and academia. This requires not only an overhaul of Israel's Foreign Ministry, and particularly of its larger embassies, by infusing them with significantly larger operating budgets, but also the mobilization of our civil elite in Israel and overseas for the task.

Operation Cast Lead may have ushered in a new era in Israeli national security. The frontiers of our survival have shifted from the battlefields and military to our formal and informal diplomats the world over. This is a struggle that may be less bloody, but is as existentially important.

Popular Dutch novel envisions Israel's destruction

By CNAAN LIPHSHIZ
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Western European readers are snatching up copies of a novel that shows Israel's fiery destruction through the eyes of an immigrant from Holland.

The Dutch-language book, titled Het Recht op Terugkeer (The Right of Return) has sold more than 100,000 copies in Holland alone, where it stayed in the best-seller lists for weeks.

The German translation (Das Recht auf Rucktehr) hit bookstores a few weeks ago, and is on its way to making the best-seller lists in Germany and Austria, with English, French and Spanish translations in the works.

The 55-year-old author, Leon de Winter, says that a Hebrew translation of the book "will naturally have to follow."

Set in 2024, de Winter's novel tells the story of Bram Mannheim, a 53-year-old ex-scientist who has lived in Israel for 35 years.

The story describes Mannheim's life, which fell apart after the unsolved disappearance of his son in 2008. His dysfunction mirrors Israel's own sorry fate.

In the novel, the state is no larger than the greater Tel Aviv region and is forced to contend with constant attacks by Arab neighbours. Following an especially bloody attack on a border post, Mannheim, who volunteers as an ambulance rescue worker, makes a discovery that puts him on the trail of a plot in which his son may have been involved.

"In my book, I painted the nightmare of which I and many other Jews are so afraid," de Winter told Ha'aretz in a telephone interview from his home in Los Angeles.

De Winter says one "can't exclude the possibility that some readers derive pleasure from hearing about how the Jews lose and are defeated. It's possible, but it would be a perverse pleasure from a novel about anguish and destruction."

The author, who was born to a Jewish Orthodox family in the Dutch city of Den Bosch, says that "Israel's enemies would probably not buy" a book with his name on the cover. "They know I am the enemy," he said, citing dozens of strongly worded opinion pieces he has penned in defence of Israel over the years in Dutch and German publications.

De Winter, who has never lived in Israel but visits regularly, attributes the attention that the book has received in European media to a "general uncertainty as to the survivability of the Zionist enterprise," which his novel touches on. This uncertainty, he argues, has never left the Jewish psyche since Israel's formation in 1948 and has set the tone for the world at large.

The fear for Israel's survival among European Zionists is as acute now as it was 40 years ago, according to de Winter, whose brother used to live here.

"It goes back to the refusal by Arab states and peoples and others to accept the existence of the Jewish state," he said. "The opposition is constantly growing despite Israel's peace agreements with some of its neighbours, and it's creating mounting pressure."

But he says his book is not a prophecy. "The book deals with real threats and fears, yes," de Winter said. "But in writing it, I gave into the deepest pessimistic corners of my soul. It is not what I think will happen, but rather what I fear could happen."

Opinions

Speak up for Women of the Wall

When the editor of The CJN asked me to write this column, I refused. Afraid of the challenge, I didn't realize what an opportunity it was. Democracy is founded on the principle of participation. Voting is only one format. The responsibility of good citizenship is to speak up, whether in criticism or advocacy. How do you make yourself heard? How do you get your opinion cited? I write.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

All this is to explain that in the past, I supported Israel, but I now find myself in the uncomfortable position of loyal opposition.

In 2009 and again in 2010, two women were arrested for praying at the Kotel. It seems absurd to even write these lines. In 1989, Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist women began to pray at the Kotel on rosh chodesh as a group. In quiet modesty, they persevered for 20 years.

Early on, there was a cartoon of two women in jail, one scantily clad, the other modestly dressed. Scantily clad asked modest, "What are you in for, honey?" Answer: "Praying at the Kotel!" Then it was a joke. Now it's real. How could it be?

How could the government of Israel criminalize behaviour that is halachically viable? The women, Nofrat Frenkel and Anat Hoffman, weren't breaking any Jewish laws. Wearing a tallit and carrying a Torah are both permissible according to the great halachic leaders of our heritage. When the Women of the Wall (WOW) pressed their legal case to the Supreme Court of Israel, it ruled that nothing the women did was against Jewish law, but in order to keep public order, the state should find a solution to satisfy those who pray there.

"Those who pray there" was a euphemism for only one sector of the Jewish world – the haredi community. The argument is preposterous. In order to satisfy and pacify the haredi element, the state justified their disturbances, ruling that the women were a source of disorder and, therefore, must be restricted.

WOW wishes to pray according to Halachah, not haredi Halachah.

This is not religious freedom. This is not justice.

Since when does Israel back down when faced with a vocal minority that attempts to exclude the rights of others?

The Kotel is not a synagogue belonging to one group. Even the army is no longer able to hold its ceremonies there. When did we give the Western Wall away?

Write to your Israeli ambassador. Write to friends in Israel. Jewish women should not be harassed by police or haredi Jews for praying at the Kotel. Speak up.

We share the burden of the immigrant

When our family crossed the Canadian border in 1965 with all our worldly goods in the trunk of a beater of a car and $1,500 in the bank, the worst thing we had to endure was the $300 fine levelled on our car – it had been purchased only five months previously (big mistake), rather than the required six.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

We knew we would be able to go home whenever we wanted to, and that we had all sorts of opportunities open to us. Yes, we started with practically nothing, but we felt we could find our way in a new country that seemed so familiar, yet was full of surprises, as we learned the differences between Canada and the United States. Let's just say that we've managed.

When others have had to leave their homelands under duress, the story is not so pretty. In three books I've read recently, the process of leaving one place – where all the comforts of a pleasant existence were expected to continue indefinitely – for another destination was not pleasant.

Helene Cooper, author of The House on Sugar Beach, is a direct descendant on both sides of her family of the founders of Liberia, the country founded by emancipated slaves. (who in turn subdued the native population of the area). She lived in comfort with servants, a summer home in Spain and a "sister" who was hired to be her companion. That all changed when Liberia was engulfed in civil war and she had to leave, penniless, to come to North America. She eventually became a respected journalist. Only after many years in "exile" did she return to her native country, a country much changed from her childhood and no longer her home.

In a poignant portrait of her Egyptian Jewish family and its trials on the way out of Egypt in The Man in the White Sharkskin Suit, Lucette Lagnado gives us a picture of life before the Jewish community of Egypt was forced out in the wake of the founding of Israel and the 1956 Suez conflict. Like Cooper's family, the Lagnados descended quickly from privilege to poverty and were much misunderstood by the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society and other agencies who looked on these French-speaking strangers as primitive and ungrateful. In fact, the settlement agencies of the Jewish community, thoroughly Ashkenazi and assimilated, treated them worse than had their Muslim neighbours in Egypt.

She, too, becomes a journalist. The book chronicles the ways her family disintegrates under the pressures of their lives in North America.

Stephan Zweig's The World of Yesterday looks back at his lost world of middle-class Jewish life as it was lived in Germany until Hitler's ascendance. Although Zweig escaped, he eventually committed suicide in South America, unable to go home or to find a place of rest in a new and unfamiliar world.

Unlike our family, these and hundreds of thousands of other immigrants couldn't go home again. Their lives might be different – and for their children, even successful – but never the same. There was a hole in their hearts that could never be filled.

For survivors of the Holocaust whom I have met, there is also a hole in their hearts. Part of that is the loss of their families, which most have had to bear, even when life here has been good. As well, their homes are not only gone forever, but have been turned into ash. Many, however, may still recall life before the war, when they flourished in their countries of origin.

We often forget that immigrants – and know that about one-third of Canadian Jews were not born in this country – had lives that they may not have left voluntarily, and that home cannot always be moved so easily across borders. We should always be aware that others, too, have holes in their hearts where home and family once resided, and where they will never be able to go again.

We share the burden of the immigrant. Let's show compassion to those who seek refuge on our shores.

Serving a broader world

Jewish organizations internationally, nationally and locally are committed to the well-being of their constituents.

However, they are also committed to serving the world at large, irrespective of religion or creed. This has been evidenced most recently in the genocide occurring in the Darfur region of Sudan and the devastating aftermath of the massive earthquake that struck Haiti this month.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

With respect to Darfur, the Canadian Jewish Congress has established the Darfur Action Committee. The committee has published a monograph titled Darfur: A Jewish Response, in which Congress outlines the rationale underlying why there must be a Jewish response to tragedies such as Darfur wherever they occur. The commitment and obligation to address humanitarian concerns is a vital part of Judaism and our very Jewish identity, but they can also be traced back to the message promulgated through the Tanach and other Jewish texts.

The Darfur publication serves as a guide to what we can all do in the context of our synagogues, local communities, schools, campuses and even in our summer camps to confront the suffering in Sudan. In addition, Congress recently encouraged congregations through all branches of organized Judaism to participate in a Darfur Shabbat across the nation.

In mid-January, a horrific earthquake wrought devastation to the already impoverished tiny nation of Haiti, including the death of an estimated 200,000 Haitians. Immediately, the World Jewish Congress, the Canadian Jewish Congress, local federations and other institutions within our community sprang to action. The UJA of Greater Toronto, the Combined Jewish Appeal of Montreal, Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver established funds to support relief aid to the area.

A press release from the Canadian Jewish Congress explained that these funds support the concept of tikkun olam. Although tikkun olam "is usually meant in a metaphorical sense, in this instance it will be literal as Haiti works to recover from this devastating earthquake," the release states.

Canadian federations raised more than $682,000 by Jan. 20. These funds are to be matched by the federal government.

This is not, of course, the first time our community has responded the need abroad. For example, the United Jewish Appeal also raised funds when a similar catastrophe struck in Indonesia recently.

Reaching out to the broader world is not restricted to international aid. Here in Edmonton, Jewish organizations work to promote a better life for the non-Jewish components of the community. For example, Jewish Family Services (JFS) of Edmonton serves many persons, Jewish and non-Jewish alike. In fact, with respect to some of the programs offered by JFS, the majority of the clients served are not Jewish.

For the past 13 years, Edmonton's Jewish community has conducted its annual Mitzvah Day. Each year, during a three-month period, more than 20,000 items, including cash donations, vouchers for grocery stores and transit tickets are collected. An army of volunteers sort, box and deliver these items to 23 different charitable organizations for redistribution to those in need. This year, over 300 volunteers participated.

Why do we feel the obligation to assist those in need – in our local communities, in Haiti and in Darfur? The notion of tikkun olam is a core value of our religious tradition. Moreover, in parshat Vayikra, we are admonished "not to stand by idly." Maimonides interpretation of this commandment is: "Whenever a person can save another person's life but fails to do so, he transgresses the commandment not to stand by idly." The central message is clear.

We have an obligation to come to the aid of those in need, whether close to home or in distant lands. We must make time in our busy lives to contribute our fair share, to assist those in need and to do what is necessary to repair the world. Too often in the past, the world has stood back and watched as Jewish communities experienced terrible suffering and unimaginable losses. We must not stand by idly.

The Kirshner File

A decade marked by terrorism and wars

The decade we've just left behind was book-ended by terrorism, punctuated by four wars and a Palestinian uprising, marked by failed Arab-Israeli peace talks, lashed by the emergence of a virulent form of Islamic radicalism and underscored by Iran's efforts to build a militarized nuclear arsenal.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Herewith, in chronological order more or less, is an itemized list of the disasters, missteps and false dawns that unfolded during a turbulent, deadly decade.

Toward the close of March 2000, the then president of the United States, Bill Clinton, went to Geneva, Switzerland, to meet his ailing Syrian counterpart, Hafez Assad, in a last-ditch attempt to breathe life into Israel's flickering peace process with Syria. Had he succeeded, Israel and Syria might have signed a peace treaty. (Seven years later, Turkey tried but failed to revive the on-again, off-again negotiations, which began in the early 1990s.)

Shortly afterward, Israel's prime minister, Ehud Barak, ordered a unilateral withdrawal from southern Lebanon in compliance with United Nations Resolution 425, thus ending a problematic occupation. Israel invaded Lebanon in 1978 and again in 1982 to squelch Palestinian terrorism and to create a fresh geopolitical reality in the region, but found itself bogged down in a costly war of attrition with Hezbollah, an Islamist Lebanese militia supported by Syria and Iran.

Israel pulled out of Lebanon within a few days in May 2000, but its withdrawal, widely regarded by Arabs as a sign of weakness, burnished Hezbollah's credentials in Arab nationalist circles.

Israel's pullout emboldened the Palestinians to launch a violent rebellion in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip in September 2000, following the breakdown of the Camp David summit in July. This intifadah was far bloodier than the first, which erupted in 1987 and fizzled out amid hopes stirred by the 1991 Madrid peace conference.

On Sept. 11, 2001, in a development of historic proportions, 19 Arab terrorists, 15 of whom were Saudis, hijacked four U.S. airliners, crashing them into the World Trade Center in Manhattan, the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., and an empty field in rural Pennsylvania. The death toll was 2,973.

The hijackers, all Muslim extremists in the service of Al Qaeda, were motivated by a matrix of reasons: a resentment of western colonialism in the Middle East, a hatred of modernism, secularism and Israel, and a widely warped interpretation of Islam.

Responding to the most serious violation of its soil since Pearl Harbor, the United States attacked Al Qaeda bases and the radical Taliban regime in Afghanistan, thereby launching an international war on terrorism. Sept. 11, however, was not Al Qaeda's first blow. Under the guidance of Osama bin Laden, who has yet to be captured or killed, Al Qaeda previously struck the destroyer U.S.S. Cole in Yemen, U.S. embassies in eastern Africa and American sites in Saudi Arabia.

Nine years on, the United States and its allies, including Cánada, still confront Al Qaeda terrorism – its latest plot in Detroit on Dec. 25 was mercifully foiled – and continue to fight a protracted, increasingly bloody guerrilla war with a resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan. The war has forced the United States to send an additional 30,000 troops to Afghanistan and has spilled into neighbouring Pakistan, whose resolve is questionable.

Palestinian suicide bombers from the West Bank made life miserable for Israelis in 2002, when a record number of such attacks occurred. For Israel, the last straw was the so-called Passover massacre in Netanya, which claimed the lives of 30 Israeli civilians.

On March 29, the Israeli army stormed into the West Bank in Operation Defensive Shield, reoccupying towns given up during the Oslo peace era, which effectively ended with the eruption of the second intifadah. The aim of the offensive, Israel's biggest in the West Bank since the Six Day War, was the eradication of terrorism. But needing more than boots on the ground to dismantle the terrorist infrastructure, Israel began building a separation barrier along the the West Bank. Since much of it cuts into the West Bank, Israel was criticized by friends and foe alike.

Israel's shaky relationship with the president of the Palestinian Authority, Yasser Arafat, collapsed as the intifadah intensified. The Israeli prime minister of the day, Ariel Sharon, who would succumb to a massive stroke, concluded that Arafat was neither a reliable nor trustworthy partner.

The big event of 2003 and beyond was the U.S. invasion of Iraq. The roots of the conflict were entangled in Iraq's invasion of Kuwait in 1990 and the UN's decision to impose sanctions on Iraq. Iraq's refusal to leave Kuwait precipitated the 1991 Gulf War, during which Iraq fired 39 Scud missiles at Israel. After 2001, the United States accused Baghdad of concealing weapons of mass destruction, supporting terrorism and destabilizing the region.

The United States and its allies invaded Iraq, easily deposing Saddam Hussein's Baathist regime in an impressive "shock and awe" campaign. The political vacuum was violently exploited by Iraqi Baathists, nationalists, foreign jihadists and common criminals. They took to the streets in a sectarian insurgency that has cost the U.S. military more than 4,000 fatalities and greatly dampened enthusiasm for the war in the United States. Seven years on, with Iraq polarized along ethnic lines but with suicide bombings having drastically declined, Iraq is still a work in progress. Washington has promised to withdraw from Iraq by 2012, but Iraq's future remains murky at best.

To win pan-Arab backing for its presence in Iraq, the United States signed on to the Arab-Israeli "road map" peace plan. Unveiled shortly after Baghdad's liberation in April 2003, the performance-based plan obliged Israel and the Palestinian Authority to negotiate a two-state solution. But talks yielded little of lasting value, Israel continued battling terrorists in the West Bank and Gaza, and the Israeli government expanded its maze of settlements in the West Bank, pushing back the prospects of peace even further. The Bush administration, in an attempt at peacemaking, convened the Annapolis conference in 2007, but it was a bust.

In April 2005, Syrian troops withdrew from Lebanon under duress, following accusations of Syria's complicity in the assassination of Lebanon's prime minister, Rafik Hariri. For Syria, which regarded Lebanon as an integral component of its territory, it was a bitter blow.

Israel withdrew unilaterally from Gaza in 2005, having decided that its occupation jeopardized its character as a Jewish state. Gaza descended into chaos as Hamas (an Islamist rejectionist group opposed to Israel's existence) and Fatah (a mainstream secular organization in favour of peace talks with Israel) jousted for control. The issue was settled by two interlocking events: Hamas' election victory in 2006 and Hamas' seizure of Gaza in 2007.

Israel's first war with the forces of Islamic radicalism occurred in the summer of 2006, when Israel and Hezbollah fought an inconclusive month-long border war. Israel hit Hezbollah hard, but Hezbollah managed to launch nearly 4,000 rockets into Israeli communities, exposing Israel's Achilles heel. Israel's second war with Islamic fundamentalists, in the Gaza Strip, started in late December 2008 and spilled into January 2009, after Hamas refused to extend a ceasefire and continued firing rockets and mortars at Israeli towns. The war ended three weeks later.

Throughout the decade, Israel's most dangerous adversary, Iran, developed a highly controversial nuclear program, an issue that will muddy the waters of the Middle East for years to come. Yet nothing is carved in concrete. Libya, in 2003, gave up its nuclear and chemical weapons program, and the Israeli Air Force, in 2007, bombed what was said to be a secret nuclear facility in Syria.

Tragedy in Haiti

Haiti relief fundraising

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

The United Israel Appeal raised just under $900,000 for Haiti relief as of last Friday.

Linda Kislowicz, the CEO of UIA, thinks the numbers may go over the $1-million mark in the near future.

"Let's just say money is still coming in. The response has been very steady," she said. "I think at some point it will probably dwindle. People respond to what they perceive is an emergency."

The UIA will work with IsraAID, an Israeli-based search and rescue team, and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), which helps communities worldwide. Among its initiatives, the JDC raised funds for incubators, which were needed for the Israel Defence Forces' field hospital in Haiti.

The UJA Federation of Greater Toronto raised $514,000 as of Monday.

Howard English, the vice-president of communications at the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, hasn't seen a decline in donations.

"The response has been amazing. Within the first half hour of the [Hope for Haiti Relief] fund being established, we raised about $10,000. That pace has kept up throughout," he said.

"All you have to do is watch TV for two minutes to see the combination of homelessness, hunger, sickness and desperation [in Haiti] to understand why it's so important to contribute."

The money raised for Haiti relief will go to IsraAID through the UIA.

Federation CJA in Montreal raised $250,000 as of last Friday.

The Jewish Federation of Winnipeg raised $34,099 as of last Friday.

The Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver raised about $48,000 as of last Friday.

Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee's Haiti Earthquake Relief Fund raised about $200,000 as of Monday and has started distributing funds to the House of Hope Orphanage and the Israeli relief workers in Haiti.

According to Sarah Zelcer, the director of international projects and education at Ve'ahavta, the response from the Jewish community has been strong throughout last week, but donations are beginning to slow down.

"People are probably starting to focus on longer term rebuilding issues," she said.

Tragedy in Haiti

'Hundreds and hundreds of wounded people'

While flying to Haiti, Merin and his team talked logistics. Upon arrival, they were shocked.

"There were hundreds and hundreds of wounded people on the streets," he said, adding that patients began to line up before the hospital had been set up.

Merin's days start early, at about 5 a.m., and although they're supposed to end at 12 a.m., it's hard to turn down a patient.

"I'm just up all the time, patients come in the day, evening, night. They just keep on coming," Merin said. "We are overwhelmed with patients."

The field hospital often sees more than 100 people every day and performs around 50 surgeries per day. Most patients have to wait up to 10 hours for what could be life-saving treatment.

Merin, who is a surgeon at the Shaare Zedek Medical Center in Jerusalem and who worked in a Toronto hospital for several years, says many of the injuries are orthopedic, such as fractures and open wounds. Those with more serious injuries probably died before they could be treated, he said.

Dr. Ofer Merin works with patients in the field.

When Merin landed in Haiti, he found unique challenges.

"The hospital… is a reserve hospital, which is meant for… soldiers. It doesn't have any people treating any children, illnesses, women giving birth," he said, adding that experts and equipment were brought in for the mission.

Apart from healing wounds and binding broken bones, the hospital has helped about 10 women give birth as of last Thursday. Merin is also seeing patients as a result of local violence. By last Thursday, the hospital had treated about seven or eight people with gunshot wounds.

The hospital, which has an emergency room, a neonatal unit for newborns, X-ray machines and blood-test labs, has begun to see more repeat patients, but it doesn't have the resources to treat many in-patients, Merin said.

"We're working in a very different environment than any of us are used to. We're getting patients that we would keep for days [in regular hospitals]. We're doing our best to discharge them," he said. "We cannot afford to keep too many in-patients. We can manage 40. We're getting 50 or 60. We can not go beyond these numbers."

After the first three or four days, the field hospital started to run out of equipment.

"No one thought we'd [see] those numbers [of patients]," Merin said, adding that staff was sent to the city's abandoned hospitals to gather more supplies.

"There was no point of time since we came here that we didn't… treat people because of a shortage of equipment," he said.

Since the initial earthquake, there have been several aftershocks, the largest of which was a 6.1 magnitude quake that hit about 56 kilometres from Port-au-Prince. While Merin's field hospital wasn't affected, he has seen several patients who were.

Merin doesn't know how much longer his unit will stay in Haiti, but he knows why he's there.

"To help people in need," he said.

Tragedy in Haiti

Montreal man's family holds out hope he's alive

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Alexandre Bitton's family continued to hold on to what seemed an impossible glimmer of hope late last week that he was somehow alive in the rubble of a Haitian hotel 10 days after the impoverished country was hit by a devastating earthquake.

"The latest news is that there is still no news at all," Jocelyne Bitton said in an interview last Friday about her son, the only Canadian Jew known so far to have been a victim in the quake.

"We pray a lot, cry a lot. We hope and we pray."

"They are still looking," Bitton's wife, Line Dufresne, told The CJN on the telephone from her Pierrefonds home last Thursday. "He's still missing. There is no news."

Alexandre Bitton

Dufresne; her parents, Yves and Micheline; Alexandre's parents, Jocelyne and Ralph; his younger brothers Guillaume Mikhael and Geoffrey Emmanuel, and other family members continue to keep an almost constant vigil by their phones, as they have since Bitton's disappearance Jan. 12.

Jocelyne Bitton said she has been in daily contact with the Israeli embassy but has been told "nothing is going on" in terms of making progress in locating Alexandre.

According to reports on the Internet – and confirmed by Jocelyne Bitton – an Israeli team from ZAKA, a volunteer Israeli emergency response unit, responded within 24 hours to family requests to search for Alexandre, in conjunction with the Israel Defence Forces Front Command, which is also present in the country.

But she was much less satisfied with the initial feedback the family got from Ottawa in determining the status of her son.

"The last few days have been better, but no one told us anything," Bitton said. "It was very frustrating."

Bitton, 36, was among a group of Canadians checking in at around 4 p.m. at Porte-au-Prince's best hotel, the Montana, 90 minutes after landing on Air Canada flight 950.

An information technology consultant with a company called HDNM International Inc., Bitton was in Haiti for the first time with company owner Martin Turgeon to spend a week meeting with clients.

Turgeon, Dufresne said, had picked up her husband at their Pierrefonds home to go to the airport.

It was the last time she and her husband spoke.

Bitton and Turgeon had agreed to meet for a drink at the poolside hotel bar, and Turgeon had just gone outside when the earthquake struck, avoiding the collapse by mere metres.

"The last time I saw Alexandre was at the check-in desk," Turgeon told The CJN.

Turgeon returned to Montreal Jan. 15, and it remained unclear where exactly Bitton was situated in the hotel when the quake hit at 4:53 p.m. One report said he was still checking in, but Jocelyne Bitton said it's known that at some point, Alexandre went up to his room.

"We know that he is in the hotel for sure," she said. "We know he was not outside." At The CJN's deadline, Bitton was among 11 Canadians still reported to be missing in the rubble. Bitton's colleagues also reportedly were in contact with Red Cross and United Nations officials by e-mail in the effort to locate him.

Bitton and his wife met in 1997, but were married only last August by Rabbi Allan Bright of Montreal's Shaare Zedek Congregation. Rabbi Bright converted Dufresne to Judaism, and performed the bris on their son, Joshua, after his birth close to 2-1/2 years ago.

Bright said he has been in touch with the family "at least" twice a day since Bitton went missing.

"They are members [of the shul] and friends," Rabbi Bright said.

He described Bitton as "a good soul, a wonderful husband, father, son. It's a real tragedy."

Dufresne, meanwhile, last Thursday was struggling to maintain a semblance of normalcy in the household, especially for the sake of her son.

"He doesn't realize too much yet, but he's young, only two," she said.

"I'm doing the best I can," she added. "I'm covering all my bases right now, because I have to make sure Joshua is fine, too.

"I hope he comes back, but, you know, it's already nine days," Dufresne said as she began to sob.

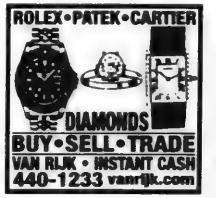
Community agencies provide service to caregivers

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Now in its second year, Family Caregiver Connections, a collaboration of seven agencies, helps caregivers by offering support and education.



Co-led by Baycrest and Circle of Care, the agencies include Bernard Betel Centre, Chai Tikvah Foundation, Jewish Family & Child, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services Toronto, and Reena.

Patricia Wendy, program co-ordinator, said that commonly, caregivers are children of elderly parents; parents of adult children who are disabled; spouses or siblings.

"Caring for a family member can be overwhelming, and caregivers often feel stressed and isolated. It can be a financial and emotional strain, and caregivers often have their own health problems.

"Most, though, they don't think of the impact on themselves, and they don't seek out services. They feel that caring for their loved one is their own responsibility, and they feel guilty for any negative feelings."

She said that 450 caregivers requested services in the program's first year, "and that number is growing quickly. We are quite pleased, because caregivers have to take care of themselves, as well as taking care of their loved one."

Services Family Caregiver Connections offers educational workshops related to seniors and caregiving, transportation services, in-home respite care, groups for Russian-speaking caregivers, individual counselling and support, information and referral services and group education and support.

"Reaching out to the Russian population is important, because they're often not well connected. We've translated a lot of our material into Russian so they have access to a lot of information they had been missing," she said.

The partnership organizations can connect caregivers with day programs, financial assistance, Holocaust survivor services, social programming, wellness services, kosher meals on wheels, and friendly visitor and phone pal programs.

Some caregivers want to connect to others, but they don't know where to start, she said. "Start with us, we're here to help."

They have run a support group for couples, in which one takes care of the other, Wendy said. "It had a recreational and therapeutic component, and the couples shared activities with each other, and with other members. We are planning to run it again."

She said that they plan educational events based on the needs of participants. "They often don't realize what they need until they get here. They like to hear about others, and then they relate it to themselves. All educational events have a social component."

In order to make it easier for caregivers to participate, she said, transportation is provided to and from events, and all programs are free.

Teacher reinvented himself in mid-career

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Nicholas Maes – a novelist with a PhD in classical studies and an adjunct faculty member at the University of Waterloo – decided about a decade ago that he needed to reinvent himself.

"They are our teachers..."

When he began his career, Maes, now 49, thought he was being practical by planning to teach classics during the academic year so he could have the summer off to write fiction, he explained in a recent interview at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Kimel Family Education Centre in Vaughan, where he became head of the history department last year.

But university classics departments are shrinking, Maes noted, explaining his decision to return to school in 2001to obtain his bachelor of education degree from the University of Toronto's Ontario Institute for Studies in Education. He also completed his doctorate at U of T.

A lesson from the teacher: "When you study history, you're getting a front-row seat to the greatest show on earth."

In addition to his duties at Tanenbaum-CHAT – where he is in his seventh year of teaching – and the time he devotes to writing and spending time with his wife and three children, Maes also teaches one evening course a week at the University of Waterloo.

In his most recent novel – Laughing Wolf, which was published last June and is set 200 years in the future – Maes neatly connects his love of classics with his understanding of teenagers. The book's protagonist is a 15-year-old who knows Latin, a fact that is key to the welfare of the world.

Maes, who has had four books published, has been writing since a 1981 cycling trip through Greece. Among his four published books are a young adult biography of Robertson Davies, and Dead Man's Float, a post-Holocaust-themed adult novel published in 2006, which borrows loosely from aspects of his own Dutch and Jewish backgrounds.

A native of Windsor, Ont., Maes spent most of his childhood in Montreal, aside from a year-and-a-half-long stint in Holland when he was a young teenager. He has lived in Toronto since 1979.

Currently, Maes has two books in the works – an adult novel that he has almost finished, and another one for children. "I like working on both at the same time," he said.

In his classroom, he said, there is a lot of discussion. "There's so much to talk about."

Maes gets excited about the connections between history and the day's headlines, and the way class discussions move from past to present, and back again.

"You realize [that what happens today is] a product of this long evolution… therefore, it's not preposterous to draw comparisons between the situation in Israel and the situation Napoleon was faced with in Spain… That's what makes it so interesting."

He considers technology a double-edged sword and uses "very little" of it in the classroom. "It's the cut and thrust of conversation that counts," he believes.

Maes recognizes that history is sometimes a hard sell, particularly in a Jewish school with a dual curriculum.

But, he said, "history gives you an opportunity to admire human brilliance, and then you see the other side of the coin too – the sheer nastiness that we bring to the table. I like to concentrate on the brilliance."

As well, he added, "the subject is just fascinating. If you're interested in fashion, there's a history to fashion. If you're interested in technology, there's a history to technology... Wherever we are, whatever we enjoy, there's a history to it. History draws everything together."

Survivors' stories live on through exhibit

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

There was one thing that saved Faye Schulman from being killed in the Holocaust. Her camera.

Schulman, a Holocaust survivor from Poland, was 16 when a group of Nazis arrived at the ghetto in Lenin, Poland, where her family had been living. Their goal was clear – to kill the entire community.

"I woke up, I heard crying, screaming. My sister was changing her children. She wanted her children to die in clean underwear," she said. "I helped. I can still feel their skin."

Schulman was a photographer at the time. She had taken photos for the Nazis and ran into an officer that she had photographed. He recognized the teenager and told her to follow another Nazi officer.

"He took me into the new synagogue, which was not in the ghetto. I noticed there were five families, a shoemaker, a tailor, a carpenter, someone who looked after horses," she said. "I understood that those are people the killer picked to be alive. I didn't want to be alive, I wanted to be killed with my mother and father."

But Schulman wasn't killed. And on Jan. 14, at the March of the Living photography, art and prose exhibit, the survivor shared her story with a new generation of photographers.

The exhibit, called "Reflections Through our Eyes: March of the Living 2009," was a collection of paintings, poems and photos. The art was submitted by Toronto high school student participants of last year's March of the Living, a two-week trip to Poland and Israel that promotes Holocaust education and a three-kilometre walk from Auschwitz to the Birkenau concentration camp.

The gallery event was organized by the Toronto March of the Living and the House, a centre for Jewish youth.

High school students from around Toronto submitted their paintings, poems and photos to the March of the Living art exhibit, held on Jan. 14 at the Lipa Green Building.

For Romy Pilarski, the co-organizer and a March of the Living participant, the artwork is a way of keeping stories like Schulman's alive.

"Each photo or poem has its own story of a participant who was in the place where [Jews] were killed," she said.

"It's a very moving experience," she said. "Hitler didn't win. They failed and we're here to tell the tale."

For Pilarski, each photo, poem and painting is proof of that. In the Lipa Green Building, where the exhibit was mounted, the walls were lined with pictures of barbed wire, empty barracks, Israeli flags and, in one of Daniel Navy's photos, the path to the gas chambers in Auschwitz.

"I'm proud of my work being displayed," said Navy, 17, a student at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. "I just think it's an awesome event. Having everyone's memories, you're taking a trip back in time. It's a really important journey to take."

Navy took part in the three-kilometre march. His most striking memory is stopping halfway through to look back.

"You see people for kilometres. It's an amazing feeling to be there and say, 'We conquered [the Holocaust].'"

'Darfur Shabbat'

He was planning to have Friday night dinner as part of Darfur Shabbat with more than 100 students at Hillel Ottawa who would hear a speaker about Darfur. As well, he said that on Saturday morning he would be at his synagogue, Agudath Israel Congregation, which was also taking part in the event.

"I do believe instinctively that this is an important issue to take up as a Jew," said Wise, a native of Toronto who is the grandson of four Holocaust survivors.

The committee's first initiative last year was the launch, with actor Mia Farrow, of the online publication Darfur: A Jewish Response. As well, said Shinewald, "we're trying to develop programs that will engage the Jewish community more deeply in Darfur advocacy and lobbying government to bring about a definitive end to the conflict in Darfur."

Wise said he hoped that Darfur Shabbat will increase overall awareness of the situation in Darfur within the Jewish community. "It's still a dire situation for a lot of Darfuris. If the Jewish community continues to be aware, then I believe we could eventually put pressure on the Canadian government to act in a way that will improve the lives of Darfuris... perhaps to help reach a lasting and peaceful resolution."

Sowing the seeds for a greener future

By SHAYLA GUNTER-GOLDSTEIN
Special to The CJN

"It was once religion which told us that we are all sinners... it is now the ecology of our planet which pronounces us all to be sinners because of the excessive exploits of human inventiveness. It was once religion which threatened us with a last judgment at the end of days. It is now our tortured planet which predicts the arrival of such a day..."

– Hans Jonas, excerpted from Mortality and Morality: A Search for the Good After Auschwitz

"I believe these words are true prophesy," said Rabbi Lawrence Troster, who was the guest rabbi in residence at Congregation Darchei Noam, the Reconstructionist Synagogue of Toronto, earlier this month.

Rabbi Troster was in Toronto on the weekend of Jan. 9 and 10 to lead the congregants in sessions exploring Jewish ecology, environmentalism and environmental justice, to help examine such questions as: "How can Jewish wisdom guide us in our quest for happiness and a more sustainable lifestyle?" "What is Jewish environmental justice?" and "How does a synagogue embody Jewish environmental values?"

A native Torontonian and former assistant rabbi at Beth Tzedec Congregation in the early '90s, Rabbi Troster is a recognized religious-environmental leader. Besides his pulpit work in Toronto and New Jersey, he is also rabbinic fellow of the Coalition on the Environment and Jewish Life, co-chair of the Interfaith Partnership for the Environment of the United Nations Environment Program, and fellowship director of GreenFaith – a New Jersey-based interfaith coalition for the environment.

The weekend, organized by Darchei Noam's Shomrei Adamah committee, was part of the synagogue's commitment to environmental issues using a number of different programs and initiatives, including its eco-conscious "green" building.

Asked what questions and lessons he wanted to leave the members thinking about, Rabbi Troster replied, "We are at a critical point in the fate of the planet: climate change, environmental responsibility and environmental justice are the critical issues facing humankind. If Judaism cannot help us with this, where else can we turn? If Judaism cannot respond... that speaks to the relevance of our religion.

"I want congregations to think about how a community can make environmental learning and responsibility a core value... as much as prayer, kashrut and teaching Torah are to our faith," he said.

"Twenty per cent of the world is using 80 per cent of the resources... generating 80 per cent of the waste. Consumerism is threatening the planet and threatening the way we deal with fellow human beings. It leads to toxic air and water, and ultimately results in climate change. Climate change contributes to rising water levels, which threaten coastal cities and countries. Why is this important to Jews? Think about it... New York – where the Jewish population is immense – is coastal. Israel is coastal. What will climate change and rising water levels mean to Israel?"

Faced with these conditions, he said Jews must ask: "What can I do?... How can I make a difference?"

To find the answers, Rabbi Troster believes that Jewish wisdom literature – from the Torah to Rashi and beyond – holds the ultimate truths.

"Central to Judaism are the concepts of bal tashchit [do not destroy] and tikkun olam [repair of the world]. There exist myriad texts we can study on these issues, which outline ideas of righteous practices in dealing with other people and with the Earth. But all of these teachings are about much more than just giving charity and being eco-conscious," he said. "They are also about environmental justice."

The environmental justice movement combines environmental activism with ideas of social justice – for the goal of protecting those who are economically, racially and politically disadvantaged from suffering disproportionately as a result of environmental harm. Rabbi Troster referred to literature on the Principles of Environmental Justice, which have served as a defining document for the growing grassroots movement. (See www.ejnet.org for a full list of the principles.)

Rabbi Troster also suggested that every faith wants to believe it is the most "green," but "the reality is that none of our traditions had to deal with the environmental crises we are facing today. Environmentalism is a challenge to our whole theology."

So, where is Judaism when it comes to environmental impact? The news is not all dreary.

"Judaism is an optimistic religion. We believe in tikkun olam. Jews are strong supporters and activists for environmental causes and organizations."

It is only recently, though, that these issues have become strongholds in the consciousness of the Canadian Jewish community, he said.

Celebrating Tu b'Shvat in Guelph

By HOWARD PARTNOY
Special to The CJN

GUELPH, Ont. — In keeping with a concept adhered to by the Jewish People since biblical times – protecting the environment – Tu b'Shvat, or the New Year of the Trees, will be marked by Guelph's Beth Isaiah Synagogue on Friday evening, Jan. 29, with a service and special dinner.

"Tu b'Shvat is an opportunity for us to reconnect to the importance of land, the trees, the resources, and to connect to the land of Israel... by eating fruit and reading different literature speaking of the beauty of nature, importance of trees and importance of resources," Beth Isaiah's spiritual leader, Cantor Avraham Fisher, said in an interview.

The prayers on Tu b'Shvat are modelled after the Passover service, which tells of the Exodus from Egypt. The Tu b'Shvat service tells of the different kinds of fruit and the beauty of nature, the importance of trees and our responsibility to the next generation.

These are obligations that we have throughout the year, he explained.

Israel is the only place in the world that has more trees than it did 100 years ago, and it's one of the leading countries in preserving nature and making the desert bloom, Fisher added.

The holiday occurs on the 15th of the Jewish month of Shvat. Jewish tradition emphasizes the wise use of resources. In Moses' speech before the Jews enter the Land of Israel, he said that if you lay siege to a city of the enemy, you're not allowed to cut down trees that bear fruit in order to conquer the city, Fisher noted.

In Israel it's a custom for people to plant trees across the country. For example, all members of the Israeli parliament, including the prime minister, plant trees. It's also becoming a custom to eat seven species of food grown in Israel: wheat, barley, grapes, figs, dates, olives and pomegranates.

Underlining the importance of natural resources, Fisher noted that in rabbinic literature from around 200 BCE, Rabbi Yohanan ben Zakkai said, "If you are holding a seedling in your hand and you hear that the Messiah is coming, plant the seedling and then greet the Messiah."

Also, in the book of Genesis, it's said that when God put Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden, they were to till and protect the land.

"Our task is twofold – to protect the world we have and to make it a better place to live for the coming generation," Fisher said. "In prayers, we pray there will be rain in Israel and it will be fruitful."

The Jewish way of responding to natural disasters

By RABBI TZVI HERSH WEINREB
JTA

Guest Voice

See. Feel. Act.

These three words are Judaism's answer to the questions that occur to religious people at this time of great human suffering in Haiti.

There are two kinds of questions that we find ourselves asking when we are confronted with scenes such as the disaster that has struck the island nation.

On the one hand, we ask "why?" Or, more intensely, "How can God have allowed this to happen?"

On the other hand, we ask "what?" "What can I, a single helpless individual hundreds of miles away from the tragic scene, do to help?"

Quite simply, our tradition insists that we shelve the first type of question. It has been asked before, perhaps millions of times over the course of history. Answers abound, and the theological literature deals with it at length. But none of the answers has ever totally dispelled the question.

Judaism insists instead that we ask the question of the second type. We must inquire as to the response that God requires of us. And to that inquiry the answer is powerful and clear: See! Feel! Act!

First, we must "see." We cannot yield to the understandable temptation to block the scenes of suffering from our visual senses. We must watch scenes of the catastrophe and allow ourselves to be affected by them.

Second, we must feel the pain of those who are suffering so horribly. We dare not anesthetize ourselves to that pain. We cannot allow ourselves to in any way explain the suffering away, with sick, silly, smug but sadly comforting statements such as "they must have deserved it." We must see the victims as humans no different from ourselves, innocent and blameless, who are in a condition of desperation and dire need.

And then we must act to respond to that need. There are always ways to act, no matter how distant we are from the scene of tragedy, no matter how impotent we might legitimately feel.

Moments of tragedy and crisis are not the times to philosophize about God. This is not the time to speculate about "why bad things happen to good people." It is the time to ask, "What can I do to help those poor good people?"

Those of us who have lived lives of faith and religious commitment know that the answers to our doubts about God do not come forth from our philosophical quest. Rather, they slowly issue from the context of a life of moral action, from deeds of charity and compassion.

The Jewish community, in its entirety, can be proud of its response thus far to the Haitian catastrophe. Rescue teams from the State of Israel and millions of dollars from the Jews of America are clear examples of our response. Whatever the motivation for these responses, this has been a religious response, a Jewish response.

The way to deal with religious doubt and skepticism about God is to act compassionately and to respond generously, in faith and certainty, and in confidence that our actions will allow us ultimately to bear witness to God's benevolent love.

Rabbi Tzvi Hersh Weinreb is the executive vice-president emeritus of the Orthodox Union.

Setting priorities

Money Matters

Usually, when we think of politicians and money, our thoughts turn to government waste, deficits or tax policy. And that's when things are going well. All too often, however, our thoughts turn to mismanagement, undue patronage, corruption and kickbacks. And when the focus isn't on money, we often associate politicians with polls, re-election campaigns, arrogance, deal-making and abandonment of principles. While such a description may be unduly harsh, for too many, it's not far off the mark.

Thankfully, there are other models. I was tremendously moved by the comments of former Ontario Conservative leader and Toronto mayoral candidate John Tory announcing his decision not to run again for mayor of Toronto. Luckily, I was in the car and heard an excerpt from his press conference, yet, sadly, I haven't seen his remarkable words mentioned elsewhere.

Asked by a reporter (unfortunately, many in the media make politicians look like saints) if he wasn't running for fear of losing yet again, he responded by stating, and I paraphrase: "In life one can not dwell on the past. While I wish things would have turned out differently, it was not to be. I noticed that I have been described in the media as a man of integrity who stands up for what he believes. When the time comes to look back on my life, I cannot think of a more important message to leave my children. That is so much more important than any political office could ever be." What beautiful words. If they were emulated by others, imagine how much more would be accomplished.

We in Ontario's Jewish community (and other faith-based communities) feel Tory's defeat in the 2007 provincial election much more acutely than others, to the tune of well over $100 million every year. It's not at all surprising that the same person who puts values before votes would support extending education funding to all children in Ontario. Despite its political cost, he refused to change course and has never regretted that decision. Some things are more important than winning.

Economics and moral character are inextricably linked. Those whose overarching principle is integrity share little in common with those whose overarching principle is making money, even if the two work side by side. Perhaps the most important and most difficult concept to grasp for one who aspires to climb the moral ladder (at least from a Jewish point of view) is that money is no more than a means to an end. This is something that needs constant reinforcement and is a much more valuable lesson than anything learned in business school.

The Talmud notes that God sheds three tears daily. The first two are for those who are unqualified yet assume positions of rabbinic authority, and for those who are qualified yet are employed elsewhere. How tragic it is when the wrong people are in the wrong jobs. Each job carries its own moral challenges, and we must prepare accordingly. I'm reminded of the comment by the 19th-century ethicist Rabbi Yisroel Salanter who said it takes much greater moral strength to be an honest businessperson than to be a rabbi – not many are going to give their rabbi the opportunity to fraudulently lose their money.

It's the businessman who must be more "religious" than the rabbi, not vice versa. Having worked both in the business world and in the rabbinate, I can personally attest to the truthfulness of this observation. While it may be true that nice guys finish last, this is so in the games that matter for little. In the game that really counts – where how we get to the bottom line is more important than the bottom line itself – nice guys are the true gold medalists.

Celebrate United Jewish Appeal's Campaign 2010

Closing event features Dan Senor

By Daniel Horowitz

If you were asked what country – excluding the United States - has more companies listed on the NASDAQ than any other, you would be excused if you didn't come up with Israel right away.

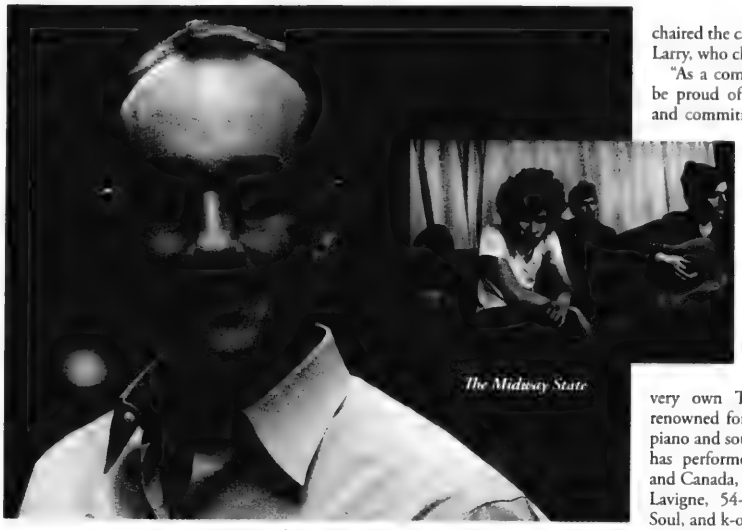
The fact is, in only 61 years of existence, the Jewish state has become a true powerhouse in the world of high-tech.

That's just one of the interesting facts that will be discussed by the author of Start-Up Nation: The Story of Israel's Economic Miracle, Dan Senor, during United Jewish Appeal's Campaign 2010 Closing Celebration on February 16, at Events On the Park.

Senor, an accomplished, entertaining and enlightening speaker, is also a geopolitical expert, investor and adjunct senior fellow for Middle East Studies at the Council on Foreign Relations. He will discuss how Israel's ever-changing global political situation has transformed the state into that high-tech powerhouse.

Campaign 2010, chaired by Debbie Kimel and Ken Tanenbaum, is specifically aimed at raising funds in four areas of interest:

- Meeting the urgent needs of our most vulnerable
- Transforming lives in Israel
- Battling anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism on campus
- Building a vibrant Jewish future



Author Dan Senor

"Debbie and I have had a front row seat in the greatest Jewish community in the Diaspora. It has responded positively in difficult economic times to make sure that those in need among us are not left behind," said Tanenbaum. "I am deeply appreciative of the opportunity to have played this role with Debbie, which, for me, carries on a tradition in my family going back three generations to my grandfather Max, who chaired the campaign in 1961 and my dad, Larry, who chaired in 1999."

"As a community, we have so much to be proud of, but most of all, the depth and commitment of our leadership, both professional and volunteer, is what truly stood out to me," said Kimel. "Having seen, first-hand, the incredible commitment and passion held by our community was awe-inspiring. It made me even prouder, if that's possible, to live in this wonderful community."

Musical entertainment at the closing celebration will be provided by Toronto's very own The Midway State, a band renowned for their unique blend of rock, piano and soulful lyrics. The Midway State has performed across the United States and Canada, opening for such acts as Avril Lavigne, 54-40, Evanescence, Collective Soul, and k-os.

Tickets, if purchased on or before February 9th are $20 ($25 after that time), include a dessert reception.

To purchase tickets visit ujaevents.com/registration/closing, or call 416.635.2883 extension 5229.

Don't miss an evening with an Israeli King

The National Basketball Association is coming to Vaughan!

Actually, before you apply for season tickets, an explanation is due.

On Saturday, February 6, at 7:30 p.m. Omri Casspi of the NBA's Sacramento Kings, the only Israeli ever chosen in the first round of the NBA's annual draft, and one of the league's top rookies, will take his skills to TanenbaumCHAT's Kimel Family Education Centre on Vaughan's Lebovic Campus. The UJA Federation event promises an evening of unique entertainment with something for everyone.

"This event promises to be an entertaining way of bringing together many of York Region's Jewish residents," says an enthusiastic Jeff Ross, chair, UJA's York Region Division. "And having an internationally known professional athlete visit – with our community's youngsters on hand - at TanenbaumCHAT's Kimel Family Education Centre, one of Vaughan's shining jewels, is the icing on the cake. It's the perfect opportunity for us to display the wonderful, growing community that lives north of Steeles Avenue."

Omri Casspi

For every one of us who ever dreamt of going one-on-one with a professional athlete, or who wanted to rub shoulders with an NBA player, this is your chance.

The six-foot, nine inch Casspi, who used to wake up at 4:00 a.m. to watch the Chicago Bulls and Michael Jordan, signed with Israel's elite basketball team, Maccabi Tel Aviv at the age of 17. According to Sports Illustrated, "During an early-season game against the Warriors, Casspi went face-to-face with notorious brawler Stephen Jackson. Even in practice, Casspi is constantly hand-checking teammates, bucking the image of the soft Euro."

He developed his tough, grinding style under the watchful eye of Svika Sherf, coach of the Israeli national team who, according to Sports Illustrated, used to tell his players before big tournaments, "We are not going to be the tallest or the strongest or the most talented. But we have something different. We are Israel. We are going to play harder, and that's how we are going to win."

"I think it's also important for York Region Jewry to understand that they have long-been the fortunate recipients of a dynamic and growing infrastructure complete with services and facilities necessary for our burgeoning community," said Ross. "And now, with many of those services being relocated north of Steeles, we are even more fortunate and I think the Jews of this region need to know about their responsibility to give back to the community through UJA Federation of Greater Toronto."

UJA Hope for Haiti Relief Fund surpasses $400,000

Israeli organizations playing major role in relief efforts

By Daniel Horowitz

Responding to the 7.0 magnitude earthquake that wreaked havoc on the Caribbean nation of Haiti on Tuesday, January 12, IsraAID, an Israeli-based search and rescue team supported by United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto*, landed in Port-au-Prince less than three days later and its life-saving efforts continue today.

In fact, thanks to the generous and compassionate response from Toronto's Jewish community, a second IsraAID team landed in Haiti this week in order to expand the scale of its operation to meet the needs of the victims following last week's powerful 6.1 magnitude aftershock.

So far, United Jewish Appeal's Hope for Haiti Relief Fund, which is raising money to support IsraAid's efforts, has raised over $400,000. Every dollar donated to the fund will be matched by the government of Canada. These matching dollars will be sent by the government to its Haiti Earthquake Relief Fund to support vital relief efforts.

IsraAID is a coordinating body of Israeli and Jewish NGOs in Israel that provides humanitarian aid worldwide. United Jewish Appeal has previously supported its work following earthquakes in Peru and Pakistan, on the border of Darfur, and after Hurricane Katrina and the recent typhoon in the Philippines.

Donations made to the Hope for Haiti Relief Fund support the work of IsraAID, specifically in the areas of emergency medicine, search and rescue, post-trauma counseling and water purification. IsraAID members are also in talks with various hi-tech companies specializing in restoring collapsed communications networks.

Members of IsraAID's medical team treat a 6-year-old girl pulled from the rubble in Haiti.

Immediately upon arriving in Port-au-Prince, IsraAID's medical professionals rushed to join local physicians at the site of the city's collapsed central hospital where thousands of wounded gathered, desperate for help.

"The scenes in the hospital were horrible," said Nurse Sheva Cohen from Kibbutz Ein Yahav in the Negev. "We saw people everywhere on the floors, in the building and outside; people with amputations and bone-deep wounds, hundreds of them. The size of the catastrophe is unbelievable. Until we arrived, all of the injured were treated by only one local doctor and we were the first foreign backup team to operate in the hospital."

"It's been said that a community's true nature is determined by how it rallies around those in need," said Alan Winer, chair, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "If that's true, we should all be so proud of how our community has rallied around the people of Haiti. And I can't express just how proud I am of the State of Israel which, through IsraAid, ZAKA, the IDF, and other organizations, has responded at a time of great need. Israel's relief workers are jeopardizing their own lives to assist complete strangers facing incredible challenges."

The IsraAID operation is part of an overall Herculean Israeli relief effort. Two IDF teams, comprised of search and rescue personnel and canine operators are going out on rescue missions. The IDF Medical and Rescue team has been treating patients at a field hospital in Port-au-Prince. The field hospital is prepared to receive dozens of ambulances evacuating injured children from the different disaster stricken areas. The hospital, which can treat 500 patients a day, includes 40 doctors, 25 nurses, paramedics, a pharmacy, a children's ward, a radiology department, an intensive care unit, an emergency room, two operating rooms, a surgical department, an internal medicine department and a maternity ward.

One week after the hurricane struck CNN reported that Israel was the only state to have sent a field hospital equipped with all that is required for surgical operations. Doctors from various missions send patients requiring surgery to Israel's makeshift hospital, particularly those whose condition is critical, the news network said.

According to the report, other field hospitals contain no more than stretcher beds and medical teams who administer first aid, and are not prepared for complex surgery. In addition, a six-man delegation from ZAKA's International Rescue Unit organization (four from Israel and two from Mexico) succeeded, after 38 grueling hours, in pulling eight students from a collapsed eight-storey Port-au-Prince university building.

Donations to United Jewish Appeal's Hope for Haiti Relief Fund can be made through www.ujadonations.com/haiti or by calling 416.631.5705.

 Funds raised are allocated to United Israel Appeal Canada. IsraAid delivers relief services in Haiti for UIA Canada.*

In 1957, Barry and Philomena Lowes pursued their dream and founded Camp Timberlane, a residential summer camp located on a private lake in Haliburton Ontario. Their vision was to create a camping experience that would build confidence, spirit and leadership. They strived to provide a nurturing environment that would recognize a person's uniqueness and where values would be learned that would benefit them over a lifetime. The tradition continues today and is being carried on for future generations by the present Director and owner Corey Mandell.
After 52 years, Barry and Phil are committed more than ever to their life pursuit of making camping available to the new generations of children. To make this possible, they have created "Share the Magic": an endowment with the sole objective of introducing new campers to the Timberlane experience.

Bone marrow drive organized by teen

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

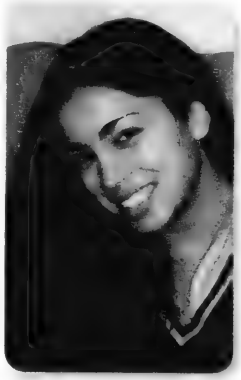
Shari Ichelson Silverman and Yael Chapman have one thing in common. They don't take no for an answer.

When Ichelson Silverman, 34, found out she had leukemia, she refused to stop fighting.

When she was told that her only hope was a bone marrow transplant, she became determined. Not just to find herself a bone marrow donor, but to help everyone on the donor list, her father said.

"After we found out she needed the transplant, she... said, 'Daddy, you have to find me a match,'" said Mike Ichelson. "I had no idea how I was going to do that. I said, 'Yes, honey, I will.' She said, 'Daddy, if I'm not here, if I don't make it, you have to promise you won't stop looking. That will be my legacy.'"

This is how Shari's Mission, an organization that tries to find bone marrow matches, was born.



Yael Chapman

And this is what Chapman, a Grade 11 student at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, is refusing to give up on.

Chapman, 16, first learned about Shari's Mission from a family friend. She attended a bone marrow drive last October, but was told that she was too young to be tested.

"I think that sometimes, as a teenager, I find it a little frustrating. You can have a lot of fervour and you want to get involved and change the world, but it's not always that simple," she said.

But, like Ichelson Silverman, the teen is resolute. Since she couldn't get tested, she decided to organize a drive of her own, which takes place on Feb. 7 at Beth Sholom Synagogue.

"I e-mailed the shul at 11:30 at night, and the next night I had e-mails from three people. It just took off within a week," she said, adding that she's part of the shul's youth council.

Chapman understood the importance of Shari's Mission when she met Ichelson Silverman and her father at the bone marrow drive in October.

"It was really interesting to actually get to meet her. You hear about people all the time. It's very rare that you actually see the cause," she said.

While the drive at Beth Sholom is an important initiative to Shari's Mission, Chapman and the shul decided to go a step further. They'll be helping Ichelson and his daughter create bone-marrow-drive kits which will include step-by-step instructions on how to organize a drive. The kits will be sent out to synagogues and churches nationwide.

It doesn't take much to get tested at a bone marrow drive, Ichelson said. Drives, which are run by organizers such as Chapman and experienced volunteers, ask community members aged 17 to 50 to do a swab test. This means each person will be asked to swab their cheeks. The swab will be tested and, if a match is found, the person will be called in for a blood test. As of now, there are more than 800 people in need of bone marrow donors in Canada. Often times, this number will only go down as people die, Ichelson said.

Since Ichelson Silverman is an Ashkenazi Jew, she has about a 70 per cent chance of finding a match.

"The other 30 per cent keeps me awake at night," her father said.

This is why, when Shari's Mission was started last year, Ichelson and his daughter reached out to the Jewish community first. But the organization is not a Jewish charity.

"There's a huge misconception that it's a Jewish organization," Ichelson said. "No, we're not. Shari said, 'You've got to get everybody off the list.' We're going beyond the Jewish community."

Ichelson is reaching out to businesses and various communities, including the Chinese and Latin communities.

Shari's Mission is currently looking for volunteers to start chapters throughout the country.

For more information, e-mail mike@sharismission.com. The bone marrow drive at Beth Sholom will be held on Feb. 7 at 11:30 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. To volunteer, call 416-783-6103.

Class Acts

HELPING HAITI: As part of their involvement with Project Giveback, Grade 5 students at Leo Baeck Day School organized a school-wide shoe drive, collecting new and lightly used shoes to send to Haiti and help with relief efforts there. With the help of Ellen Schwartz, founder of Project Giveback in conjunction with SoftMoc and Soles4Soles, the shoes were to be shipped to Haiti at the end of last week. Here, Thornhill campus students organize numerous boxes of shoes to send.

Media marvel at Israel's Haiti reponse

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

The devastating earthquake in Haiti dominated the news last week. And on U.S. television networks, several news reports focused on the speed with which Israel – although 7,000 miles away from Haiti – managed to establish a sophisticated field hospital.

This story had special resonance in the United States, because, as intense as the American relief effort was, it had not managed to match the Israeli accomplishment, even as the number of Haitians in dire need of medical attention remained overwhelming.

For instance, on ABC World News (Jan. 18), anchor Diane Sawyer introduced a story by saying that Israel's medical unit had already become "legendary."

Sawyer interviewed Dr. Richard Besser, ABC's senior medical editor and an expert in emergency response.

"What do you make of this?" Sawyer asked.

Besser pointed to the contrast between the U.S. and Israeli response: "The timeline is very different," he said.

"The Israelis arrived here Friday night [Jan.15]. By Saturday morning they had set up a field hospital. The Americans were just getting started this morning [last Monday]. I can't understand that difference when Haiti is so close to our shore."

Sawyer and Besser remarked on the specialization within the Israeli field hospital: a surgical unit, intensive care units for children, a pediatric ward, a maternity ward and so on.

On Jan. 19, NBC Nightly News carried much the same report, with an additional focus on the high-tech nature of the hospital: X-rays and other diagnostic procedures could be digitized and transmitted to Israel – or anywhere else for that matter – for consultation. The medical technology was all in the interest of reaching the best and quickest decision for the patient.

With its quick reaction to the Haitian disaster, Israel provided the world with a model of emergency medical response.

What are the facts about Iran's nuclear weapons program?

In "Don't bomb Iran's hopes for change" (Globe and Mail, Jan. 9), Doug Saunders argued that Iran's nuclear program is slowing down and doesn't pose an immediate threat.

"Iran is close to a making a weapon the way an owner of an iron mine is close to making an automobile," he wrote.

Saunders added: "Their [nuclear] program is dropping away, probably because the [political] protests have created other priorities.

"Given this and other intelligence discoveries, the White House now believes it will be as long as three years before Iran is even capable of beginning the enrichment of its fuel into weapons-grade purity. Even then, under the most desirable of circumstances, even one weapon would take five or six additional years."

However, in "Iran's Path to the Bomb," published in the Jan. 14 New York Review of Books (a publication known for being anything but hawkish and alarmist on foreign affairs), nuclear physicist Jeremy Bernstein wrote that, depending on how the centrifuges are configured at its recently disclosed Qom nuclear site, Iran "could enrich enough uranium for two or more bombs a year."

Bernstein argued that the more immediate threat is at the main Natanz nuclear enrichment site where, given the technical procedure he outlines as possible, "the 1,700 kilograms of low-enriched uranium now available [there] could produce enough uranium 235 to make one bomb in as little as six months."

Bernstein's article is worth reading in full. It can be found at www.nybooks.com/articles/article-preview?article_id=23560.

Further to last week's column on British MP George Galloway, not to be overlooked is how Galloway's feverish anti-Jewish bigotry may well be a strong motivating factor in his pro-Palestinian crusade.

In a Dec. 28 piece for the Scottish Daily Record under the headline, "Dark Echoes of the Holocaust," Galloway bolstered a Swedish journalist's notorious blood-libel allegation (in the paper Aftonbladet) that Israel harvested organs from dead Palestinians, and then went on to compare Israeli doctors with infamous Nazi doctor Joseph Mengele. (Galloway wrote that these doctors were "playing mini-Mengele on Palestinian prisoners in Israel jails.")

In case anyone needed additional proof of Galloway's twisted, hateful mind, there it is.

BB in court dispute with Vancouver lodge members

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) is embroiled in a legal dispute with members of a Jewish building society in Vancouver who are disputing the Toronto-based organization's efforts to take control of two large seniors residences.

"Historic members" of the Lions Gate B'nai B'rith Building Society say B'nai Brith Canada had no connection to Haro Park Centre and B'nai B'rith Manor, which were constructed locally with government money.

B'nai Brith, however, alleges that control over the properties falls to it as heir of B'nai Brith International (BBI), which it claims had jurisdiction over Vancouver B'nai Brith lodges and properties until it transferred them to the Canadian organization in 2008.

At the heart of the legal dispute is a question of who can appoint members to the Building Society, which operates the seniors residences. According to the Building Society's bylaws, its members are drawn from Lions Gate Lodge. The lodge has been dormant for years, but historic members are attempting to revitalize it. At the same time, B'nai Brith Canada has been operating on a parallel track with supporters in Vancouver to reconstitute the lodge. If successful, the BBC-supported lodge would be in a position to appoint members to the Building Society.

B'nai Brith Canada and Jack Chivo, a member of the Lions Gate board, petitioned the Supreme Court of British Columbia to stop a planned annual general meeting of the Building Society in early December. They claim the meeting was improperly constituted and that changing the Building Society's bylaws, as was proposed for the meeting, would jeopardize its funding.

Revolves around control of two seniors residences

"The primary funding of the Building Society, which allows it to continue to meet its objective of providing affordable senior's housing, is the British Columbia Housing Management Commission. Under the terms of the agreement of BCHMC, any bylaw change must obtain the prior written consent of BCHMC. This consent has not been obtained," states the B'nai Brith claim.

The five respondents to the petition, who are purported members of the Building Society board, reject the claim that B'nai Brith has any jurisdiction over the Building Society's affairs.

They state in court documents that Lions Gate Lodge was connected with "B'nai Brith USA" until 2008. The Building Society is a separate legal entity and unconnected to either the Canadian or American B'nai Brith organizations. It draws its members from the lodge.

The directors acknowledge that the Lions Gate Lodge is defunct and so no new members could be added to serve as a pool for the membership of the Building Society. As a result, they say "historic members" have control over the society and its assets.

They allege B'nai Brith has wrongly attempted to reconstitute the lodge, so as to get control of the building society.

"BBC, with its base in Toronto, has attempted to assert power and control of the society with no basis in the society's constitution, bylaws, any other rules or laws," state the respondents' court documents.

The documents assert the building society is an independent entity over which BBI never had control. "You cannot give what you do not have."

"B'nai Brith [Canada] did not provide any financial or other support to the [Building Society]. B'nai Brith did not contribute any funds or effort to the society obtaining any interest in the property owned by the society. All the funds and land were obtained from governments, some donations and mortgages on the properties... [Building Society] members were not required to and did not pay dues to B'nai Brith International, Canada or any other B'nai Brith organization."

The two properties at the heart of the dispute provide housing for low income seniors. Haro Park Centre is a 13-storey apartment tower with 68 suites and which also provides nursing care to 212 senior citizens. B'nai B'rith Manor is a 65-suite apartment building.

Wallenberg Day program focuses on Iranian threat

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee says that if we have learned anything from history, it is that in the absence of taking positive and meaningful action to confront and defeat evil, we become enablers.

"We don't have the luxury of saying that it doesn't matter to us," Shimon Fogel told students at the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's fourth annual Raoul Wallenberg Day Student Conference, which is held in conjunction with the Gray Academy of Jewish Education.

"Everything in the world today matters. Whatever happens in the world, it is just a matter of time before it reaches Winnipeg, Halifax and London, England," Fogel said.

Each year, the conference focuses on a different issue. "Previously, we have learned about world hot spots Darfur and Afghanistan. This year, our focus was on Iran and the threat that Iran poses to Israel and the world," said Shelley Faintuch, the federation's community relations director, who was one of the conference organizers.

The conference speakers included the Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, who spoke about Wallenberg, the Swedish diplomat who saved tens of thousands of Hungarian Jews during the Holocaust; Sayeh Hassan, an Iranian-born pro-democracy activist who practises law in Toronto, and Daniel Ashrafi, an Iranian-born Jew living in Winnipeg who was an eyewitness to the Iranian Revolution in 1979. Manitoba Conservative MP James Bezan briefed the students on the federal government's position on Iran, and Manitoba Liberal MP Anita Neville introduced Cotler.

Shimon Fogel

Fogel outlined the Iranian regime's many sins, including its suppression of political opponents; the fostering and funding of Islamic terror throughout the Middle East, and the leadership's reported efforts to develop nuclear weapons – with President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's stated goal of "wiping Israel off the map."

Iran has put the lie to the accepted wisdom over the past few decades that showing tolerance and encouraging mutual respect get results, Fogel said. "It has become a matter of win or lose."

However, he added, the Iranian regime is shaky and showing signs of desperation.

One of the fruits of this year's Wallenberg conference is a petition signed by Gray Academy and other students (from St. John's-Ravenscourt School and Grant Park High School, who accepted Gray Academy students' invitation to participate) asking that the Canadian government hold Iran's leadership accountable for its oppressive actions in Iran and its actions abroad.

The students were encouraged to send letters to MPs demanding that Canada put Iran's Revolutionary Guard on the government's list of terrorist organizations.

Fogel also encouraged the students to use social networking contacts to get the word out about Iran. "You have an edge on older people," he said, "because you understand the power of the new media [such as Facebook and Twitter].

"You can each make a huge difference," he added.

Fogel spoke about Wallenberg's courage. "Wallenberg kept fighting to save Hungarian Jews right up until his own last day of freedom," he said. (Wallenberg disappeared in January 1945 and is presumed to have died in a Soviet prison.) "His example inspired other diplomats in wartime Hungary to issue visas to Jews and save their lives."

On a personal note, Fogel recalled that his Hungarian-born parents – who are Holocaust survivors – went back to Hungary several years ago.

"They came back quite depressed," Fogel said. "They had gone back to my mother's home village and attempted to visit her old house. The resident thought she wanted to reclaim the house, and everyone in the village shunned my parents.

"What brightened their mood was Canada's decision at that time to make Wallenberg an honorary citizen of Canada," he said. "Although my parents hadn't known Wallenberg, the fact that someone was prepared to stand up against oppression and take risks restored their faith in humanity."

One student asked Fogel why Saudi Arabia is given a free pass as a human rights violator. Fogel replied that the difference between Iran and Saudi Arabia is that the latter is engaged with other countries, while Iran flagrantly thumbs its nose at the world.

Fogel said he's perplexed that "women's groups throughout North America aren't up in arms about the lack of women's rights in Saudi Arabia."

Iranian lawyer speaks at Wallenberg conference

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Sayeh Hassan, an Iranian pro-democracy activist and criminal lawyer living in Toronto, told a student conference that "Iranian people are no longer satisfied with reforming [Iran's] existing Islamic regime, but want regime change entirely."

She said that the media often try to paint Mir Hossein Mousavi, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's rival, as a "reformer" who is in favour of regime change, but that's not the case.

Sayeh Hassan

Hassan, 29, said that all Iranian presidential candidates, including Mousavi, were "hand-picked" by the Guardian Council and the Supreme Leader of Iran, and would not have been approved if they had been advocating for "real change in Iran."

Hassan spoke at the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's fourth annual Raoul Wallenberg Day Student Conference, which is held in conjunction with the Gray Academy of Jewish Education.

If he were to come to power in place of Ahmadinejad, "Mousavi will just extend the life of the Islamic regime, but not lead to real reform," and the formation of a democratic republic of Iran, Hassan said.

Mousavi was the prime minister of Iran "when 10,000 political prisoners were summarily executed in the summer of 1988," she added.

Hassan told The CJN that as a result of openly calling for Iranian regime change in Canada, and writing on her blog, shiro-khorshid-forever, at www.shiro-khorshid-forever.blogspot.com, she has "received a lot of threatening anonymous e-mail from people associated with the Iranian regime." The writers say, "If you don't shut up, we'll shut you up."

Hassan added that it's difficult for journalists reporting from Iran to speak about the desire for regime change, as the reporter could "be thrown out" of the country.

Hassan, who left Iran with her family to live in Turkey when she was seven, because her father was "a political activist who had to leave," said that it "was good I left Iran, otherwise I'd be in prison now."

From her contact with activists in Iran and watching YouTube videos, Hassan said it's clear that people are directly "attacking the foundation of the Islamic regime."

She said that for the first time in Iranian universities, students have raised Iran's current flag, without the Islamic regime sign in the middle, adding that activists in some Iranian cities have also raised the pre-Revolutionary green, white and red Iranian flag, which has the symbol of a lion and sun in the middle.

Hassan said that the appearance of the lion and sun flag indicates people are harking back to days when Iran wasn't controlled by an Islamic regime.

She added that "religious minorities including Baha'is, Christians and Jews are systematically oppressed and abused by the Islamic regime."

She told The CJN that there are many different political parties and groups abroad that could form a democratic government in Iran, as well as numerous monarchist groups, Communist groups and the People's Mujahedin of Iran, an Islamic socialist organization that advocates the overthrow of the Islamic Republic. "The Shah's son [son of former Shah of Iran] is one of the opposition abroad," Hassan said.

"If there is a revolution and people are able to participate in a free and democratic election, a secular and democratic leader may rise from inside Iran. That would be impossible at this point, because any opposition will be jailed and eliminated immediately," she added

Hassan said it's "terrible" that U.S. President Barack Obama's is dialoguing with Iran. "By saying, 'Let's have a dialogue,' he is accepting the legitimacy of the regime."

Hillels raise funds, awareness for Haiti

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Judy Schwartz, the director of the Jewish Student Association at McMaster University, knows why she needs to help people in Haiti.

"It is commanded of us," she said. "From the Babylonian Talmud… 'We sustain the non-Jewish poor with the Jewish poor.'"

Schwartz's organization is one of several Canadian Hillels that have started raising funds and awareness about the recent earthquake in Haiti, which left hundreds of thousands homeless, injured or dead.

McMaster's Jewish Student Association has started collecting donations for the country and will partner with the African Caribbean Association to raise more money.

"The collections are starting," Schwartz said. "We have a responsibility as humans and as Jews to do the best for the world that we can."

The JSA would also like to plan a karaoke night at McMaster, in which students would pay to sing, with the money going to relief efforts in Haiti.

Hillel of Greater Toronto will also be taking part in relief efforts. It's planning a coffee house event featuring the Kol Neshama choir. Proceeds will go toward efforts in Haiti, said Joel Pearl, program associate for Hillel at York, although Pearl doesn't yet know which charity Hillel will give the money to.

"[The event is] the number 1 thing at our table," he said, adding that Hillel is still working out details for the event.

For Pearl, fundraising is about more than just money. It's about awareness.

"It's important for students to understand what's happening," he said. "It's giving them an opportunity to learn and grow and understand what happens outside the bubble that is their campus and home life," he said.

Margot Bychutsky of Hillel at York, agrees.

"You're so far away, it's not like you can jump on a plane and go there and help. We may not be able to rebuild houses physically. By holding events, we can help," she said.

Hillel at the University of Ottawa took part in a coffee house event held at Carleton University last Thursday. The coffee house, which included musical performances, was organized by the Carleton's International Student Centre to raise money for Haiti relief.

It raised about $500 for the Red Cross, which will be matched by the Carleton University Student Association.

For Jennifer Hadad, student president for Hillel at U of O, fundraising efforts are a way to unite students in Ottawa.

"It's something that all student clubs are coming together to support," she said. "It shows that… we're all on this Earth together and we can have sympathy for [people in need] even though they're so far away."

Students can donate to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Haiti relief fund through Hillel of Greater Toronto's website at www.hilleltoronto.org.

Ethnic media on the rise, panellists say

By MICHELLE BITRAN
Special to The CJN

As mainstream print media face a worldwide crisis, multicultural and multilingual media in Canada have been growing steadily along with the country's immigrant population, speakers said at the University of Toronto last week.

The Canadian Journalism Foundation, a non-profit organization dedicated to promoting excellence in journalism, held a forum called The Rise of Ethnic Media, at the U of T's Innis Town Hall last Tuesday evening.

The four panellists were Lori Abittan, president and C.E.O. of Multimedia Nova Corporation, Shirley Chan, managing editor of the magazine and supplement section of Ming Pao Daily News, Jagdish Grewal, editor-in-chief of Punjabi Post, and Madeline Ziniak, national vice-president of OMNI television. Noëlle Richardson, chief diversity officer of the Ontario Public Service, moderated the panel.

"I'm proud of the word ethnic," Ziniak said, adding that identifying with one's culture and language helps raise self-esteem. Ziniak, who helped bring programming in more than 15 languages to OMNI1, believes that ethnicity is a main feature of Canadian culture.

At the panel, Abittan emphasized the importance of multilingual media in assisting new immigrants to integrate into Canadian culture.

Abittan branded the Canadian cultural mosaic as the "new mainstream." Her company and its divisions produce cultural publications, create ethnoculturally targeted marketing and run a multilingual job board.

A major issue surrounding ethnic media in Canada, which includes publications like The CJN, is whether or not they cover too little local news and too much homeland news. Grewal admitted that Punjabi Post, the first daily Punjabi language paper outside India, often focuses on Indian news. He added that he hosts a Punjabi language radio show that deals solely with Canadian issues and politics in order to keep his community informed.

"It is our responsibility to continue cross-cultural media efforts," Ziniak said, adding that it is the audiences who request homeland news as opposed to Canadian news. Ziniak recognizes the importance of homeland news, but believes that culturally informed local news is of great use to new Canadians as well.

Ziniak also said that, as newsrooms begin to reflect the cultural demographics of Canadian society, coverage of Canadian and world news will become stronger and more relevant to immigrant communities.

Abittan believes in the importance of informing the immigrant population of Canada's history.

"How can we take part in Canadian society if we don't know where Canada has been and where Canada is going?" she asked. Her company is preparing to distribute a series on Canadian history to many of their cultural publications.

The future of ethnic media in Canada depends largely on new waves of immigrants and interest from second- and third-generation Canadians, said Chan of the Ming Pao Daily News.

Chan said the Daily News, which has a readership of more than 275,000 for its eastern edition alone, has begun to remedy this concern with outreach to Chinese-Canadian youth. Their Little Reporter program teaches children to write news articles in Chinese. So far, the program has been a success.

"We feel optimistic about the future," Chan said.

Businessman aims to help build African middle class

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

For Tal Dehtiar, Africa is about more than just AIDS, poverty and death.

It's about potential.

Dehtiar saw this potential when he helped found MBA's Without Borders (MWB), a not-for-profit group that matches MBAs with small businesses in developing countries.

It was MWB that lured him to Kenya about four years ago. He instantly fell in love.

"I just loved the people, I loved the place, but I was sick and tired of everybody talking about it like everybody's starving or like everybody has AIDS," he said. "[Africa] isn't as bad and scary as everyone says it is."

When in Africa, Dehtiar can't ignore the poverty, but it isn't all he sees.

"There are pockets of... war and starvation, but maybe if we start talking positively, we'll give [the people of Africa] hope."

Dehtiar, 29, started MWB when he was 25, after getting his MBA at McMaster University.

"I was kind of not feeling... it in terms of where I was going. The master's of business focused on Bay Street, I was interested in international development," he said.

This led him to launch MWB with a friend.

Since then, the group, which is now part of a larger NGO, has helped HIV-positive women make and sell handbags in Swaziland, has started a radio show in Singapore and has created an agri-business in Belize that supports rural communities.

Through the non-profit, Dehtiar learned the power of business. But he also learned that he wanted to do something outside the charity sector.

"I knew the charity world wasn't where I wanted to be," he said. "I've seen so much charity money wasted away on things that don't make sense."

Around May 2009, Dehtiar left MWB to start Oliberté Footwear, a shoe company that makes its products entirely in Africa. His goal is to help build the middle class in Africa through the company.

"In Africa, there are no small businesses. If you want to change an economy and the poverty in Africa, you need to build up the middle class," he said. "I love business, that's the truth. I love what business can do if used in the right way."

Oliberté uses leather from Ethiopia and will use rubber from Liberia. Right now, Dehtiar's working with three factories in Ethiopia, and hopes to reach other countries in the next few years. He's selling his shoes online and is starting to sell through some stores in North America.

Through his new company, Dehtiar is trying to prove

While Tal Dehtiar's friends travelled to Europe after high school, the founder of Oliberté Footwear decided to visit Central America and Africa instead.

that Africans can succeed if given the right tools.

"There's a lot more poverty, but these people don't want handouts, they just want to have the same life we have. Maybe they want to travel, maybe they want to have kids. They just don't have the same opportunities in terms of jobs," he said. "They want to work, but there's not enough decent jobs."

When working with factories in Africa, Dehtiar puts pressure on the employers to pay decent wages, treat women equally and give daily lunch breaks.

"We have some strict policies. If we're going to do this, we'll do this the right way," he said.

Dehtiar's love of business came from his parents, who have run a small furniture store for more than 25 years.

"I've seen first-hand what small businesses can do," he said, adding that his parents hired dozens of employees over the years.

"All these people... now have jobs because two immigrants decided to say, 'Hey, we're going to start a business.'"

Oliberté and MWB was also influenced by Dehtiar's love of travel.

When he was 17, most of Dehtiar's friends were talking about touring Europe, but he was always interested in developing countries.

"When [my friends] thought of travel, they thought Europe. It wasn't for me. I said, 'Europe's not going anywhere, but these developing countries are changing at such a fast pace,'" he said.

His first trip was to Belize in Central America. While in university, he also studied for four months in Singapore. Since then, he's helped build tree nurseries in Belize, has sold sandwiches on a beach in Chile and has backpacked through Kenya.

One of his favourite parts of travelling is finding Jewish communities.

"In [some] countries, I'm the first Jewish person most of these people have ever met, whether in Pakistan or... Liberia, they're not used to seeing a Jewish guy on his own," he said. "I look for the Jewish community everywhere I go."

While travelling alone in Zimbabwe, Dehtiar found the local synagogue.

"I'm not by any means a religious person, but I do love the idea that there are Jewish people all over the place," he said. "It's a nice little safe haven."

For Dehtiar, Jewish values are connected with his work in Africa.

"There's a lot of things as a Jewish person that you can really give. You've seen what your people have gone through and you see there's a lot of people in need," he said.

U.S. proposes direct, but low-level Mideast talks

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — President Mahmoud Abbas is studying a U.S. proposal for talks between the Palestinians and Israel at a level below full-scale negotiations between their leaders, a Palestinian official said on Monday.

The proposal is U.S. Middle East peace envoy George Mitchell's latest idea to bring about a resumption of peace talks that have been frozen for 13 months.

Palestinian sources familiar with Mitchell's weekend diplomacy said he had proposed confidence-building measures that would improve conditions in the Palestinian territories.

Israeli officials – noting that on Sunday, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had welcomed unspecified "new ideas" for talks from Mitchell – said their government stood ready to take part in U.S.-mediated discussions with Palestinian officials.

The confidence-building steps cited by Palestinians as areas they would be keen to discuss included the transfer of authority from the Israeli army to the Palestinians in more of the West Bank's territory, the removal of some Israeli checkpoints and the release of a number of Palestinian prisoners.

These measures would be discussed at a meeting of senior ministers from each side, but not the top leaders.

Israeli political sources said they were not aware of specific secondary issues, such as prisoners, that might be discussed with the Palestinians. They spoke rather of talks at a ministerial or lower level that would look at narrowing differences over "core issues" in suspended peace negotiations.

Core issues include the future borders of a Palestinian state, the status of Jerusalem and the fate of Palestinian refugees.

A year of U.S. diplomatic effort has so far failed to relaunch talks aimed at ending the decades-old conflict through a peace treaty agreeing to the creation of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

U.S. Mideast envoy Geroge Mitchell met this week in Jerusalem with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

"Holding a low-level meeting with the Israelis that tackles issues related to the daily life of Palestinians will not be an alternative to political negotiations," said the Palestinian official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Abbas, who is facing U.S. pressure to return to peace talks, would discuss Mitchell's ideas with Arab leaders over the coming days "so that the Palestinian position will be backed by the Arabs," the official said.

Netanyahu said on Sunday he had heard "some interesting ideas [from Mitchell] for renewing the [peace] process.

"I also expressed my hope that these new ideas will allow for the renewal of the process. Certainly, if the Palestinians express a similar readiness, then we will find ourselves in a diplomatic process," Netanyahu said.

A spokesperson for Netanyahu declined to comment Monday on the content of discussions with Mitchell.

The Palestinian official said Abbas would stick to his insistence on a total halt to Israeli settlement construction in the West Bank, including east Jerusalem, before any resumption of full peace talks. He has rejected a 10-month, partial Israeli freeze announced in November as insufficient.

U.S. President Barack Obama said in an interview published last week that he had underestimated the difficulty of resolving the Middle East conflict and had set his expectations too high in his first year.

In related developments, Deputy Defence Minister Matan Vilnai said on Sunday said that while Israel was faced with military threats on all sides, it has strategically chosen to make every effort to avoid armed conflict with its enemies.

Vilnai said that Israel has its eyes on Hezbollah, who it believes is rearming in violation of a United Nations resolution, and is ready to deal with any threat.

Northern Commander Maj.-Gen. Gadi Eizenkot earlier Sunday said there was no truth to reports of imminent conflict between Israel and Lebanon, which he said represented a "virtual escalation" that has no basis in reality.

Eizenkot was referring to remarks made Saturday by minister without portfolio Yossi Peled, who said that Israel "can't sleep easy" with respect to its shared border with Lebanon and also to reports in Arab media that Israel is preparing to launch an attack.

Peled emphasized that "we're in for another round in the north, but I don't know when," with the first round being the 34 days of fighting between Israel and Hezbollah during the Second Lebanon War in the summer of 2006.

Meanwhile, Deputy Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon on Sunday told the United Nations envoy to Lebanon that Israel views the flow of weapons from Iran and Syria to Hezbollah as the greatest threat to the northern border.

Hours after Peled said that a military conflict between Israel and the Lebanese militia Hezbollah was inevitable, Netanyahu announced on Saturday that Israel has no intention of carrying out an offensive against Lebanon.

"The State of Israel is not looking for any kind of confrontation with Lebanon," Netanyahu said in a statement released by his office. "Israel seeks peace with all of its neighbours."

But, according to Army Radio, Eizenkot said that "[Hezbollah chief Hassan] Nasrallah would be happy to return to the days prior to July 2006, before the Second Lebanon War, when everything was intact.

"The group hasn't executed an attack since the Second Lebanon War," he added. "But Hezbollah is getting stronger and we are preparing for all options in order to be able to act effectively."

Anti-Semitism up dramatically in 2009, report says

JTA

JERUSALEM — Anti-Semitic incidents increased dramatically around the world and particularly in western Europe during 2009, according to a new annual report.

The report by the Coordination Forum for Countering Anti-Semitism, was unveiled Sunday by the chair of the Jewish Agency, Natan Sharansky, ahead of the International Day against Fascism and Anti-Semitism and the anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz, observed on Jan. 27.

The joint report conducted by the Agency and Israel's Ministry of Diaspora Affairs found that there were more anti-Semitic incidents recorded during the first three months of 2009 than during the entire previous year. The report says this was caused by Israel's invasion of Gaza last winter.

France recorded the largest increase, with 631 anti-Semitic incidents in the first half of 2009, compared with 474 in all of 2008, and Britain came in second with more than 600 incidents.

The incidents were also notable for being more serious, according to the report, with hundreds being considered extremely violent. There were eight murders attributed to anti-Semitism.

A poll by the University of Bielefeld in Germany found that 42 per cent of those interviewed agreed that "Jews exploit the past to extort money." Poland and Spain were the countries with the highest percentage of respondents who agreed with the statement,

Israel's cabinet decided at its regular meeting on Sunday to establish a team to recommend ways to step up the struggle against anti-Semitism around the world and to strengthen co-ordination between government bodies, research institutes and organizations that deal with the issue.The team will present its recommendations to the cabinet within 120 days.

IDF sets up Haiti link

An Israel Defence Forces team in Haiti has set up a satellite-based communications system. The $2-million system is one of the area's main means of communications, according to a report in the Israeli business daily Globes. The system enabled doctors at Israel's field hospital in Port-au-Prince to conduct surgery using video conferencing with surgeons at Israeli hospitals. Communications lines in Haiti were destroyed in the devastating earthquake on Jan. 12. Journalists from around the world have used the system to file stories, and members of the Israeli delegation have been able to call home. A survivor pulled from the rubble after six days also was able to call her mother using the system.

More arrests in mosque arson

Israeli police arrested two more teens in connection with last month's torching of a Palestinian mosque. The further arrests bring to eight the number of people who have been arrested in the attack.

Falash Mora coming to Israel

Some 150 Ethiopians claiming Jewish links came to Israel last week, the first groups to immigrate in more than a year. Eighty-one Ethiopians, known as Falash Mora, landed at Ben-Gurion International Airport early in the morning on Jan. 18, according to the Jewish Agency for Israel. Another 63 Ethiopians were scheduled to arrive this week. The Ethiopians claim to be the descendants of Jews who converted to Christianity generations ago. Representatives of Israel's Interior Ministry and Jewish Agency emissaries have been in Ethiopia in recent months examining the eligibility of members of the Falash Mora community to immigrate to Israel, according to criteria set by the Interior Ministry. Some 600 members of the community have received permission to immigrate. The Jewish Agency estimates that another 2,000 will receive permission during 2010. Most of the new immigrants have relatives who came to Israel in recent years.

Elton John returning to Israel

British singer Elton John will perform in Israel for the first time in nearly two decades. The single performance set for June 17 was announced last week. John last appeared in Israel in 1993. Landing in Israel on the day of a concert, he was swarmed by media and left without performing. He was persuaded to return and perform the next day. He first performed in Tel Aviv in 1979.

Israel-Palestinian conflict major Christian challenge: Vatican

JTA

ROME — Two days after Pope Benedict XVI's visit to a Rome synagogue, the Vatican issued a document citing the Israeli-Palestinian conflict as one of the main challenges facing Christians in the Middle East.

The 30-page document released last week also cited Muslim extremism as a major challenge.

"Several conflicts in the Middle East have arisen as a result of the main point of global attention, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict," the document said.

The document contains the guidelines for an assembly of Catholic bishops from the Middle East to be held at the Vatican in October.

"Political conflicts in the region have a direct influence on the lives of Christians, both as citizens and as Christians," the document said, as part of a lengthy discussion of issues facing Arab-Christian communities and their relationships with local governments, as well as with Jews and Muslims.

"The Israeli occupation of the Palestinian territories makes daily life difficult with regard to freedom of movement, the economy and religious life," the document said, adding that "certain Christian fundamentalist theologies use sacred scripture to justify Israel's occupation of Palestine, making the position of Christian Arabs even more sensitive."

Christians living in Muslim countries face specific challenges, according to the document.

"Muslims frequently mix religion and politics, putting Christians in a precarious situation of being considered as non-citizens," it said. "Religious freedom and freedom of conscience are foreign to a Muslim mentality."

With the Internet, Islamic fundamentalist groups have become widespread. And, "with the rise of Islamism," the document added, "incidents against Christians are increasing almost everywhere."

During the visit to the synagogue last week, the Pope said Church authorities played an active role in saving Jews during the Holocaust, though "often hidden and discreet."

Italian Jewish leaders had welcomed the Pope to Rome's main synagogue for a visit they said would help strengthen relations between Jews and Catholics.

"Despite a dramatic history, the unresolved problems and the misunderstandings, it is our shared visions and common goals that should be given pride of place," Rome's Chief Rabbi Riccardo Di Segni told a packed sanctuary during the visit. "The image of respect and friendship that emanates from this encounter must be an example for all those who are watching."

In the weeks before the visit, Jewish-Catholic relations were strained by the Pope's decision to move World War II-era Pope Pius XII closer to sainthood. Critics accuse Pius of having turned a blind eye to Jewish suffering in the Shoah.

The president of the Italian Rabbinical Assembly boycotted the papal synagogue visit in protest.

In his speech, Rome Jewish Community president Riccardo Pacifici renewed calls for the Vatican to open its secret wartime archives to clarify the Pius issue. The Pope did not mention Pius by name, but recalling the horrors of the Holocaust, he praised Catholic individuals for saving Jewish lives. Pope Benedict, 82, was applauded repeatedly during his speech.

Memory of the Holocaust, he said, "compels us to strengthen the bonds that unite us so that our mutual understanding, respect and acceptance may always increase."

Benedict repeated the prayers for forgiveness for Catholic anti-Semitism made by his predecessor, Pope John Paul II.

The visit was only the second time a pope had visited the synagogue. John Paul II's visit in 1986 was a milestone in Catholic-Jewish dialogue.

Four arrested for torching Greek synagogue

JTA

ATHENS — Four men have been arrested in connection with two arson attacks on a synagogue on the island of Crete.

Two of the men in Greek police custody are British, one is American and one is Greek. They are aged 23 and 33 and have not been named.

The four are being held in the coastal town of Hania, where the Etz Hayyim synagogue is located. Police said they are all being held on charges of arson.

The men work as bouncers and waiters at local clubs, according to police.

Asked why they committed the crime, the accused reportedly said it was because they do not like Jews. The Greek man was arrested first, at which point he confessed and gave the names of the others.

The first attack occurred on Jan. 5, but it was the second attack on Jan. 16 that caused extensive damage to the synagogue's interior, archive material and technical equipment.

Evolution of International Holocaust Day reflects changing times

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
JTA

On the same day this week, Israeli President Shimon Peres was scheduled to address the German parliament and Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel was slated to appear before a special session of the Italian Chamber of Deputies in Rome.

The timing is not coincidental.

The events are focal points of international Holocaust Memorial Day, an annual observance on the anniversary of the Soviet army's Jan. 27, 1945 liberation of Auschwitz, which is marked now by the United Nations and more than two dozen individual countries.

Each year, hundreds of events take place on or near that date. Britain, Italy and Germany have particularly extensive programs.

"There is a great sensitivity to this theme on both the local and institutional levels," said Alessandro Ruben, a Jewish Italian member of parliament in Italy, where Holocaust Memorial Day has been marked since 2001. "Every year there are more and more events connected with it, including many, many educational initiatives in schools."

The nature of the commemorations is a reflection of the times, too.

While most Holocaust Memorial Day initiatives are linked directly to the memory and impact of the Nazi genocide against the Jews, there is increasing emphasis on what the experience of the Holocaust can teach in the face of other genocides and persecution, such as those in Rwanda, Bosnia, Cambodia and Darfur. World War II-era persecution of Roma (Gypsies) and gays also is examined.

Rabbi Andrew Baker, the American Jewish Committee's director of international Jewish affairs, said the shift in focus is to be expected.

"For Jews," he said, the Holocaust "was a unique and unprecedented tragedy. But national and international commemoration events by their nature also stress the universal lessons that should be drawn from the event. As survivors and other eyewitnesses pass from our midst, those universal expressions naturally grow larger."

At the same time, pro-Palestinian groups are trying to transform the international day of remembrance into an opportunity to criticize Israel.

Last year, for example, to protest Israel's military operation against Hamas in the Gaza Strip, a British Muslim organization boycotted events in Britain, and the local government in Barcelona canceled a public candlelighting as part of the Holocaust Day commemoration.

"Marking the Jewish Holocaust while a Palestinian Holocaust is taking place is not right," said a statement by an official, described as a representative of Barcelona City Hall, quoted in the La Vanguardia newspaper.

The move drew an outraged response from Britain's Board of Deputies, the body that represents British Jews.

"The conflict between Israel and Hamas should have absolutely no bearing on a day which represents the global fight against hatred," board spokesperson Mark Frazer said.

"Apart from the obvious flawed logic in making the decision, this is an affront to all Holocaust survivors and to the memory of the millions of victims. This move should draw criticism in the strongest terms from all parts of the Spanish government."

Though Germany has marked a Holocaust memorial day on Jan. 27 since 1996, the impetus for the observance in most countries came from a landmark Holocaust education forum that took place in Stockholm in 2000, a decade after the fall of Communism enabled an uncensored exploration of history. In most Communist states, Jewish issues had been suppressed and study or commemoration of the Shoah had been limited.

At the Stockholm Forum, leaders from 46 countries pledged to promote education and research about the Holocaust, and to "encourage appropriate forms of Holocaust remembrance, including an annual Day of Holocaust Remembrance."

Most participating countries chose Jan. 27, given the importance of Auschwitz as a symbol of the Holocaust, and the UN General Assembly in 2005 designated the date as an International Day of Commemoration to honour the victims of the Holocaust.

But a number of countries chose dates that reflected Holocaust events on their own territory.

In Poland, for example, it's April 19, the anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. Romania chose Oct. 9, the date when deportations of Jews by the Nazi-allied Romanian government began in 1941.

The institution of Holocaust Memorial Day has not been without its critics. Some have voiced concern that institutionalizing Holocaust memory as an official date in a calendar risked turning commemoration into a cliche.

By and large, however, this doesn't seem to be the case.

"Consider how other historical events are remembered," said Baker, who is also the representative for combating anti-Semitism of the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe. "Veterans Day in the United States seems primarily marked by department store sales, for example. In contrast, the Holocaust is recalled seriously and soberly."

He added, "While I do not want to sound overly sanguine, I don't think we should fear that the memory of the Holocaust will disappear or that Holocaust deniers will find new adherents.

"These last 20 years have witnessed a steady increase in educational and commemorative activities. And Holocaust denial is primarily a cudgel wielded by anti-Semites and haters of Israel, not something that is genuinely debated in any legitimate forum."

Deborah Lipstadt, an Emory University historian who has written widely about the phenomenon of Holocaust denial, said she was "gratified as a historian that there is this attention to this event that is now in the past, especially as the survivor generation is passing."

But, she said, "One hopes that there is attention in a deeper way: to examine how this emerged and happened, while the world stood silently by."

Israeli advocacy targets China

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In an altogether new twist in Israeli public diplomacy, a pro-Israel advocacy organization has taken its message to China for the first time.

StandWithUs, based in Los Angeles, brought a group of Israeli students and a photographic exhibition about Israel to the northeastern Chinese city of Harbin early in the new year to coincide with the International Ice and Snow Festival and the 18th anniversary of the renewal of Israel's diplomatic relations with China.

StandWithUs also sponsored a series of lectures at local universities and forged academic partnerships, all in a clear attempt to educate Chinese visitors about the diversity of Israeli society, culture and landscapes.

Michael Dickson, the Israel director of StandWithUs, said the public relations campaign, featuring the work of Israel's top 50 photographers, was successful, judging by the many visitors to the exhibition and their positive reaction to it.

"It was clear that there is a greater scope for building cultural links between Israel and China, and that there is a depth of interest among the Chinese people in Israel," he said in an interview last week.

He added, "The Israeli students touched people, and I believe we will see the benefits of this relationship-building in both the near and far future."

Zach Cutler, a StandWithUs official, said the exhibition opened with a video message from Israeli Minister of Information and Diaspora Yuli Edelstein and was attended by, among other dignitaries, the governor of Harbin and Israel's ambassador to China, Amos Nidai.

Harbin, the 10th largest city in China, was chosen as a venue due to its importance as a Jewish community centre in the 1920s and China's growing importance on the international stage, Dickson explained.

"If Israel is compiling a list of countries that count, China ought to be pretty near the top, because it is rapidly becoming the most important economy in the world."

As well, he noted, China is a permanent member of the United Nations Security Council, and its voice will be heard in the debate on Iran's nuclear program.

"We identify China as a country in which we can make a difference," he added.

Dickson said the Chinese are generally misinformed about Israel.

"They have a two-dimensional view of Israelis and Jews, though there is no concept of anti-Semitism in China. Chinese respect Jews, but there is a lot of misinformation in the Chinese media about Israel.

"There are also signs of growing Islamic anti-Israel propaganda on university campuses. So there is much to be gained from engaging the next generation of Chinese leadership."

Dickson plans more PR campaigns in China.

"Our engagement with China will continue. A follow-up event teaming up Chinese students in Israel with Israelis will take place soon."

StandWithUs, founded in 2001 to tell Israel's side of the story in the Arab-Israeli conflict, has branches in the United States, Britain, Australia and Israel.

"We don't have a formal chapter in Canada, but we do hold events in Canadian universities and communities," said Dickson.

Former Eitz Chaim student sings jazz in N.Y.

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Two things stand out that make Brigitte Zarie unique in the world of contemporary jazz singing.

First, unlike many modern jazz singers, she sings in an old-school big band style reminiscent of Frank Sinatra.

Second, Zarie doesn't reinterpret jazz standards. She writes her own songs.

"People have said it's very unique to write my own jazz songs," Zarie says over the phone from New York. "Writing these songs comes very natural to me. Critics say the songs are very reminiscent of Billie Holiday or Frank Sinatra. That's a huge compliment."

Zarie was born and raised in Toronto by her Moroccan parents, and attended Eitz Chaim Hebrew School. She moved to New York about 12 years ago to pursue her music career.

She attributes her love of jazz to her parents, especially her father. "I've always had a love of jazz. I have a very musical family. My father was a jazz musician in Casablanca, and my mother was a singer. There are definitely jazz genes in my family."

She admits it was somewhat unusual to grow up listening to jazz instead of pop and that, as a teenager, her friends thought she was weird.

"I always listened to jazz in the house and grew up listening to Stan Getz, for instance, which was a bit peculiar for someone my age," she says. "I think I've always been a bit of a weirdo musically. Singers tend to listen to other singers, but I like listening to horn players."

Horns play a big part of Zarie's sound, which can be heard on her new CD Make Room For Me. There are 11 songs, all written by her and her producer, Neil Jason.

Jason is a renowned New York bassist, producer and composer who, in addition to being in the Saturday Night Live house band in the '80s, and playing with the David Letterman Show band, has worked with John Lennon, Yoko Ono, Kiss, Cindy Lauper, Paul Simon and Hall & Oates.

"Neil Jason heard my voice on TV [she is well-known in New York for singing in commercials] and sought me out for my voice," she says. "He hired me to do some commercials and film scores with him."

"It's worked out really well. It's hard to find someone whom you gel with, and [when we started to work on my own material] I was really thrilled he understood what I was all about and that I didn't want to cover traditional jazz songs, I wanted to do my own."

There are plenty of different sounds and moods on Make Room For Me, from the finger-snapping, big band sounds of the title track, Money, Money, Money, Money, and I Love Las Vegas to the orchestral What's Wrong With Me and the more mournful See You Again, which evokes images of a smoke-filled nightclub in a film noir.

"I'm learning about my music by what the critics say about me. It's been described as some Ella Fitzgerald, some Frank Sinatra and some Billie Holiday," she says. "Ella because of the old-school sound, Frank because of the big band sound and Billie because of the moving [emotional] sound. But, really, I just hope it touches people."

She mentions one person who told her he was listening to her CD in his car and was surprised he didn't recognize the songs, because he thought he knew all of Sinatra's songs. "I've come across lots of people who like Frank Sinatra who bought my CD."

Complementing her band's sound are stellar guest artists, including award-winning trumpet player Randy Brecker, (who does an amazing solo on the opening track See You Again) guitarist Jeff Golub and the David Letterman band's horn section.

"Randy Brecker and Jeff Golub heard my stuff and wanted to be a part of it. They dug me," she says, laughing. "It's one thing to write good stuff, but it's hard to bring it to life. They've all helped me bring this to life."

Zarie makes good use of her French background, singing one of the songs, Make Room For Me, in English and again in French. "I thought it would be wonderful to sing in French and cater to my French culture – and make my mom happy."

Zarie has been surprised with the positive response to her CD, which has had airplay on more than 350 radio stations, including Toronto's Jazz FM91 and Montreal's Jazz 91.9 FM.

"I wasn't expecting this much so soon. It's taken wings of its own."

Zarie is rehearsing now for a series of dates she's lining up in Manhattan in March and in Italy, where she has a following. But she'd really like to perform in Toronto someday soon, perhaps at the jazz festival.

"Toronto is a priority for me," she says. "It's my home, and it's on the top of my list of places to perform."

Zarie's compositions have been featured on TV shows, including The O.C., and The Real World, and some have also been recorded by British pop/opera artist Russell Watson in English and Italian.

You can sample her music on her website www.brigittezarie.com. Her music is available on iTunes Canada.

ISRAEL EXPERIENCING TOURISM BOOM, HAS SECOND-BEST YEAR EVER

Despite the global recession, 2009 was the second-best year for tourism to Israel, the Israeli Ministry of Tourism has announced. Some 2.7 million visitors vacationed in Israel in 2009, just 11 per cent less than the record set in 2008. The United States is the largest source of tourists, accounting for 21 per cent of arriving travellers. Russia is the second-largest source of tourists, followed by France, Britain and Germany. During excavations in Acre, a hoard of 350 marble items was discovered, dating to the Crusader period.

Archeological discoveries

• A 2,000-year-old synagogue from the Second Temple period was discovered last fall during excavations by the Israel Antiquities Authority (IAA) in Migdal near the Sea of Galilee. The 390-square-foot synagogue has mosaic floors and walls covered with frescos.

A square stone adorned with reliefs and engraved with a seven-branched menorah was discovered atop a pedestal with a triangular base. "This is the first time a menorah decoration was discovered from the Second Temple period," said Dina Avshalom-Gorni, excavation director, Israel Antiquities Authority (IAA). Mentioned in ancient texts, Migdal played a major role in the Great Revolt and was the main base of Josephus Flavius, commander of the rebellion in the Galilee.

• In an excavation 100 metres north of the Old City wall of Acre, the IAA some months ago discovered a unique find from the Crusader period. A hoard of 350 marble items was uncovered, beneath some buildings evidently destroyed in 1291 CE, when Crusader Acre was conquered and devastated by the Mamluks. The marble hoard was removed from the field and transferred to the IAA for further study. Acre was designated a UNESCO World Heritage Site in 2001.

• The remains of a prehistoric building were discovered recently on the banks of the Hayarkon River in Tel Aviv. The building, believed to be approximately 8,000 years old, consists of three rooms covered with Neolithic-era pottery shards and tools believed to be as much as 100,000 years old. The discovery provides evidence that permanent habitation existed in the Tel Aviv region more than 8,000 years ago.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Montreal teen records Olympic song

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Teenage jazz sensation Nikki Yanofsky recently recorded the vocals for the official Olympic song of the Vancouver Winter Games.

I Believe was recorded in English by Yanofsky, a jazz singer from Montreal who also worked on High School Musical 2.

Yanofsky, 15, said she's excited to be part of the Olympics, which begin Feb. 12.

"I'm proud, because my voice is representing the Olympics. You really feel like you're doing something important. Something that will inspire, because that's the kind of song it is," she said.

"I feel extremely lucky. I can't say how much this means to me and everyone involved."

The same song was recorded in French by Quebec recording artist Annie Villeneuve. An instrumental version was recorded by Stephan Moccio, a composer who also produced Yanofsky's single.

Go west, young woman

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

How many American novels could there be that mention Calgary? In John Dos Passos' major 1925 work, Manhattan Transfer, it is a place to better oneself: "Well, how about making tracks for Calgary?" one character asks. "I know a fellow there who'll give me a job I think."

In Amy Bloom's breakthrough novel, Away (Random House), Calgary is merely part of the mysterious west, where life breaks up into new possibilities for Lillian Leyb, Bloom's unstoppable heroine. Lillian encapsulates pre-World War II Jewish life: a victim of a gruesome pogrom that sends her into an immigrant's exile on New York's Lower East Side, she remakes herself as the mistress of a Second Avenue Yiddish theatre impresario. But Lillian's American success is transformed by the news that her daughter, saved but lost at the time of the pogrom, is in fact alive in Siberia.

Norman Ravvin

It is at this point where Away's light-hearted satire of 1920s Jewish New York transforms into a more challenging kind of book – a travelogue based on what Bloom has called the "bits and fragments of a story" about a woman named Lillian Alling, who is said to have come "up the Telegraph Road, determined to walk to Russia." (The Vancouver Opera is presently developing a work based on Alling's travels, minus the pogrom.)

Away is fast-paced and lightly funny, despite the dark side of its storyline. While Dos Passos' documentary fiction aimed to capture how the tenement dwellers of New York talked, Bloom applies a scriptwriter's ear to her effort to recover 1920s slang, both Yiddish and English. She has a knack for capturing voice, for placing characters amid the bustle of a New York street or among the aggressive clientele of a chop house.

The early sections of Away have a cinematic power that is memorable and unsettling, as the action moves from the squalor of a massacre in the Russian Empire to a quirkily upbeat portrait of immigrant struggle on the Lower East Side.

Lillian's mode of travel in search of her daughter turns on a curious piece of nonsense: when she is unable to afford the cost of a steamship to Europe, a friend tells her that she should make her way overland, then up the Pacific West Coast, after which she can make the crossing on the Bering Strait to Siberia.

Like Mickey Mouse setting out for the moon with little more than a toothbrush, Lillian has her coat rigged with hidden pockets, she tucks away a few American dollars and maps cut from books in the New York Public Library. Her goal is so far-fetched that it can be portrayed in an almost slapstick way as she stows away in the bathrooms and broom closets of cross-country trains, winters in a women's prison rather than brave the route north before spring, and sets out alone on the Yukon River in a "wide and deep and misshapen" boat, only to find herself ashore, her boat sunk, five miles from her departure point.

The light tone of Away, along with its brevity, set it apart from typical historically motivated fiction. It is not truly a novel about pogrom-ridden Russia, nor is it a detailed portrait of Essex and Rivington streets. Bloom's main interest in Away is the idea of a woman like Lillian, whose movement, resourcefulness and quiet cunning remind us of a self-deprecating superhero, or a magician unaware of her own powers of escape.

The Canadian North is sheer myth in Bloom's version, a place of beauty, easy death and crusty loners in flight from bad deeds done down south. Though Lillian's travels reach as far north as Dawson City, Yukon, they end in Skagway on the Alaskan coast, and her years spent there are told in less than two pages. The ground beneath Lillian's feet – whether European or American – is not where Bloom's real interest lies. Rather, it is the act suggested by the novel's title that provides her with creative inspiration. "Away," Bloom has said, is "one of those words that has in it both coming and going. I go away, I come away; I leave here, to go away and must go away again, in order to come home."

From such coming and going, Bloom creates a novel with the tone of a comic book romance, leavened by Yiddish jokes and the surprise offered up by the newly settled West.

Norman Ravvin's fiction includes the novel, Lola by Night, and the story collection Sex, Skyscrapers and Standard Yiddish. He is chair of the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Israeli trio's first single topped the charts

By RIVA GOLD
Special to The CJN

The Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre in Toronto was abuzz recently, and this time, it wasn't coming from the Second Cup.

Habanot Nechama, an Israeli musical trio from Tel Aviv, performed at Miles Nadal on Jan. 13, in Hebrew and English, as part of a 15-concert tour.

Habanot Nechama, which translates as the Comfort Girls, consists of three female vocalists: Karolina, Dana Adini and Yael Deckelbaum. With a sound often described as "folk acoustic," the group has developed a large fan base in Israel, Europe and the United States.

Although they prefer not to define their music, the group says it most closely resembles a mix of acoustic, folk, soul and vocal music.

So far, the group has seen tremendous success. The trio's first single, So Far, quickly topped the charts, reaching No. 1 on Israeli radio stations.

"The song was inspired by life – living and feeling alive," the group said in an e-mail interview. "It's about that moment when you're inspired by the universe, and you find yourself asking questions about your life."

In 2007, Habanot Nechama released their self-titled debut album, which sold more than 50,000 records in Israel.

Since then, the group has played to sold-out audiences across Israel, Europe and North America.

Karolina, Deckelbaum and Adini were all born in Israel, and grew up in Eilat, Jerusalem and Kiryat Ono (a small town near Tel Aviv) respectively. Though they enjoy performing together, the three vocalists also pursue solo projects at the same time.

From left, Karolina, Yael Deckelbaum and Dana Adini, members of Habanot Nechama, have sold more than 50,000 records in Israel.

All three women express a connection to folk music, but Deckelbaum feels particularly close to it. Her father played banjo in a country folk band called the Taverners, and as a child, she would sing with them.

Deckelbaum and Adini met when they were 17 years old, while auditioning for a military band. The two later saw Karolina performing with her first band, Funset. After a few encounters in the Tel Aviv music scene, the three came together to form Habanot Nechama.

The trio says they greatly enjoy performing in Canada, where the audience has been extremely welcoming. "People in Canada are very polite, and they smile a lot," they said. "It's a beautiful country."

Although many of their Canadian audience members were listening to their music for the first time, the group said that it almost felt as if the audience knew the lyrics.

Currently on tour across North America, the trio say they love performing live and particularly enjoy interacting with their audiences.

"Once we were singing on a stage, and all of a sudden, we heard the sound of a flute coming from the crowd. It was a beautiful fairy, who joined in on our song," the group recalled. "It made the experience 10 times more magical."

Habanot Nechama was named act of the year in DJ Ha'ir magazine and earned a nomination for best new act at the annual Israeli Music Channel awards.

The group is currently collecting material for their second album, and look forward to performing together and creating more music in the coming years.

For information about upcoming tours or to listen to their music online, visit http://habanot.com.

Israel makes Quebec peewee hockey tournament debut

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

For the first time, a peewee hockey team from Israel will compete in an international tournament in Quebec City next month.

The 10- to 12-year-olds from Bat Yam, south of Tel Aviv, are joining teams from across Canada, the United States, Finland, France, the Czech Republic, Slovakia and Switzerland at the 35th edition of the BSR International Peewee Tournament taking place Feb. 11 to 21 in suburban Lévis.

Twenty-two players, including two girls, and three coaches will make up the delegation. Bat Yam will play a minimum of two games, in the B division.

The Israeli youngsters' participation is due in large part to Jonathan Hawey, the Lévis resident who has for the past five years been a key figure in the development of ice hockey in Israel.

Hawey, a past president of Quebec City's only synagogue, has been involved in hockey all his life, from his playing days with the Ottawa Gee-Gees to a brief professional stint in Japan, through to his current role as a scout for the Val d'Or Foreurs of the Quebec Major Junior Hockey League (QMJHL).

Peewee is the youngest level of organized hockey in Israel and still in its infancy there, but Hawey is confident the Israeli team will not be humiliated in Quebec.

Bat Yam, which is on the Mediterranean coast, has a large number of residents from the former Soviet Union. The peewee team's president is Eugeny Fusin, a former goalie on the Soviet national junior hockey team who played in the early 1990s for Thunder Bay in the old Colonial Hockey League.

Last summer, at Hawey's invitation, the Bat Yam club's head coach Dima Gromkov spent two months in Quebec upgrading his skills, spending much of that time with Lévis' Midget AAA team, Les Commandeurs.

Montrealer Alan Maislin, chair of the Israel Ice Hockey Federation, is honorary president of the team, and former Montreal Canadiens coach Jean Perron, who has coached Israel's national team, is honorary captain.

Bat Yam, however, does not have its own arena; to play on ice, players must make the two-hour drive to and from Metullah in the north, Hawey said. That will soon change with the beginning of construction in March on Bat Yam's own rink, a project Hawey also has a hand in.

The Quebec tournament is a big attraction: there'll be 128 teams this year, and all games will sell out at the 2,000-seat arena. The BSR is the little cousin of the Quebec International Peewee Hockey Tournament, now in its 51st year, which will take place concurrently and includes 16 countries and over 2,000 players.

Coach Dima Gromkov is bringing his peewee hockey team from Bat Yam, Israel, to the BSR international tournament in Quebec City.

"Bat Yam's participation is important for the future of hockey in Israel," Hawey said. "It will give the kids a goal. If they are good enough, they will get to go to Canada each year," he said.

Hockey has a following among Israeli adults with roots in hockey-playing countries, but it's a little harder to interest children of the Middle East in the sport.

Currently, there are about 40 or 50 peewee players, but Hawey predicts that will double next year because of Bat Yam's being in the Quebec tournament.

He also thinks it's good public relations for Israel when Quebecers see that the Jewish state is so keen on their national obsession.

There's a lot of curiosity about the Israeli team, he said. Bat Yam has been asked to play three exhibition games, and Hawey expects more requests. The local Chambre de Commerce wants to host them for meals.

Hawey is helping to organize the team's visit, including raising funds. He has budgeted for $20,000, excluding the airfare, which the Israelis are responsible for. Bus travel and extra security will account for a large part of the costs.

The players will be billeted with local families. Five on the team keep kosher and their needs will be met through www.kosherquebec.com, a local kosher catering service. The synagogue, Congrégation Beth Israel Ohev Sholem, which has about 125 families, including four Hebrew-speaking Israeli families, will host the Israelis at a Shabbaton Feb. 12.

To offer help, e-mail Rabbi Dovid Lewin at rabbi@jquebec.com.

The team's uniforms have been donated by a local non-Jewish businessman, owner of the sports store Jersey City. The colours are light blue, grey, black and white, with Bat Yam on the front and the menorah, the symbol of Israel, on the shoulders. The players will come with their own skates and equipment.

Hawey is also procuring winter clothing for the Israelis. Avalanche Skiwear has offered a deep discount on jackets and pants, and he's still looking for hats, gloves and boots to help the Israelis withstand Quebec City's temperatures, usually several degrees colder than Montreal.

The kids will also be treated to outings in the area during their stay, including outdoor activities like snow-tubing and dog-sledding, and they will be around for the last few days of the Winter Carnival. They will attend a QMJHL Quebec Remparts game.

The team will spend one day in Montreal before going home, hosted for brunch by Farrell Miller, owner of the Montreal Juniors of the same league, who is also taking them to a Juniors game.

Hawey, who was raised a not very observant Catholic in a typically Québécois milieu, converted to Judaism in 1983 when he was in his 20s. His father told him that they were descended from Isaac Hawey, a Scottish Jew, who, according to family lore, settled in Lower Canada in the 18th century before Aaron Hart, whom historians generally cite as the first Jewish resident.

Hawey, whose story is told in the travelling exhibition "Same Cloth/Different Threads: The Jews of Quebec," created for Quebec City's 400th anniversary, confirmed the link through genealogical research.

In the past five years, he has been closely associated with Israel's hockey program and spent a total of four months in the country last year, mainly helping organize an international tournament of professional Jewish players. Officially, he is vice-president of international relations and special events. He has become close to fluent in Hebrew.

Fortunately, his paying job at Université Laval as a recruiter of post-graduate students, allows him considerable time off.

Hawey is now working on organizing a trip to Israel in 2011 for young hockey players from Lévis.

Raging against the dying light

By MICHAEL GORDON

The Senior Side of Life

It happened again. I was called by one of the palliative-care physicians I work with who told me about a patient who had been admitted for palliative care because of metastatic (spread) cancer, and suddenly "took a turn for the worse."

As a result, the family had unexpectedly asked that she be transferred to an acute-care hospital, where she received complex and intensive medical care for an intercurrent medical event.

I asked whether the family understood the implications of their loved one's admission to a palliative-care unit. The physician felt that the request for acute care showed that the family did understand what was going on, as the cancer had spread. His question was: "Why the change of heart and direction of care?"

As I and members of the staff looked back over the last year, we could identify a number of situations in which, at the "last minute" or so, it seemed a family – acting as surrogate decision-makers – changed their minds about the previously agreed-to principles of palliative care and had their loved one sent to an acute-care hospital.

Most of the patients died in the hospital after a period of attempted treatment. Some had a condition, such as an infection, treated, and they returned to the palliative unit where they died, sometimes shortly after the episode and sometimes a period after. No one can discount any period of time alive, depending on the values and goals of the patient and family, when faced with a disease from which death is expected to occur in the near future.

The philosophy that underpins the concept of palliative care, sometimes referred to as "terminal care" or "hospice care," is an amalgamation of different concepts, the place and type of care (palliative-care unit and hospice) and the stage of a disease.

Patients and families often want a prognosis from their physicians, to give them some idea about what to expect in the future and what kind of planning to undertake. This is very important when people have to consider when family members should perhaps travel, especially if long distances are involved. Many family members want to be present in the "final" days, especially when they may want to combine a long-distance visit to say goodbye and to be at the funeral.

The problem with prognostication is that physicians, no matter how experienced, can be off by a great deal in predictions of the course of even the terminal phases of a disease. Part of the palliative care discussions should not just include a prognosticative estimate but should always contain the provision that many unexpected things can happen, often with little warning. Sudden "turns for the worse" and death occur often enough that families should be prepared for such events.

Maybe for some families, as Dylan Thomas expressed in his well-known poem, elders should "not go gentle into that good night/ Old age should burn and rave at close of day/ Rage, rage against the dying of the light." What this might mean in medical practice is that rather than dying in comfort as the goal at the end of life, the family chooses a course that might result in intubation and respirator care, intravenous treatments and a whole range of medical interventions.

These might provide some benefit for some undefined period of time. Maybe that is the modern way of "raging again the dying of the light."

Dr. Michael Gordon is medical program director of palliative care at Baycrest and co-author with Bart Mindszenthy of Parenting Your Parents (Dundurn Press). His latest book, Brooklyn Beginnings: A Geriatrician's Odyssey, can be researched from his website: http://www.drmichaelgordon.com.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Imagine eating all the foods you love and still losing weight, simply by reducing the portions.

I often meet with resistance from patients who just don't want to give up the foods they love but know they need to lose weight to improve their health. Some of these people can achieve successful weight loss when they are allowed to continue eating many of those foods, but less often or in smaller portions.

How many times have you eaten half your meal, only to realize that you are really full and could walk away? Well what if you planned to do that from the start?

For example, "I'll still have the pasta, but I'll order the appetizer size or serve myself a smaller portion." Or you may be satisfied with a bite or two of a dessert rather than a whole piece of cake, or a piece of chocolate rather than a whole bar, or you could share fries, or have a few rather than a whole order.

Sound doable? This may be the solution you have been looking for.

You do, of course, have to consider the fat and sugar content of the foods you are eating, even if you're having less. Trans fat, saturated fat, high salt and sugar all still cause health problems and potential disease, so while half a portion is healthier than a full portion, these foods still need to be consumed judiciously.

And obviously, you should remember that if you are cutting back the portion of some of these foods, you need to eat other foods to be full – fruits, vegetables, lean protein and whole grains.

But with this plan, you can have your cake and eat it too, and this may be a concept that will work to help you enjoy your favourite foods and still control your weight.

Orphans and eggplant

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

It was a foggy night on Trafalgar Road coming back from my friend's place. I needed to concentrate a lot to make sure the cargo in my back seat – my little boy, Noah River – was safe. All the while, I considered that it was somewhat dangerous to be on these roads, but I realized, too, that at any time, we could pull to the side if necessary or stop at a doughnut shop. We didn't do either, though. Rather, we followed the rear lights in front of us and stayed close to the white line.

It's Sunday night in Gressier, Haiti, and 200 orphaned children are alive, virtually untouched by one of the worst earthquakes ever. Many people are working around the clock to determine how best to help the House of Hope orphanage. We are receiving e-mails that their food supply has dwindled dramatically and little drinking water is left on the roof for the kids.

Noah had fallen asleep in the car. It's tough to shlep up my bag and his while he is asleep in my arms. The Little Man is getting heavier, and my biceps aren't what they used to be. I saw a woman I know in the elevator, but we didn't speak much, mostly because I was too tired and a little bit annoyed that the straps from the bags were pulling taut around my hands.

I just got word that the House of Hope is rationing food and taking in people from the surrounding village. Of the 2,500 people who lived in Gressier, 800 – or one-third of all its citizens –were killed by this act of God. Imagine: one moment you have a neighbour, the next you don't. Imagine: one second there's a clinic down the road, the next there isn't. That's Gressier. The thugs are coming out, and what was a dangerous place before is now perilous. And the children are young. They are without parents.

I piled through the door. Noah is asleep and seems satiated. He ate a wonderful dinner tonight at our friend's home, including fresh vegetables and fruits, rolled rice and cheese, and eggplant prepared with the finest ingredients. His tummy is full. He's satisfied.

I only had to open one lock.

Security for the orphans is a big issue at the House of Hope. There's a three-metre-high stone wall around the complex and a big iron gate in the front. We've heard that the air is contaminated. Alice Barthole, the founder of the House of Hope, says she's housing people inside the orphanage who escaped the deadly hand of the earthquake. Alice doesn't turn anyone away.

One of the most physically demanding things about raising children is undressing them while they sleep. You don't want to wake them on the one hand, and on the other hand, it's hell to get a T-shirt over their head. So I struggled and fought to ensure that my boy stayed asleep. He did, but somehow in his slumber he obliged me by putting his arms through his pyjama tops. It was warm in his room and his bed looked comfy. The black mollies swam around the aquarium waiting to be fed. It had been two days since they'd eaten.

By the time this is published, things will have changed at the House of Hope. How? I'm not sure. The kids may have been evacuated or the food and water may have arrived and all could be good. I don't know. We just have no clue.

Noah slept all night and awoke singing.

Ramah – The Camping Arm of Conservative Judaism

Camp Kadimah – Generations of Memories

A Jewish identity is a great gift. Jewish Camping creates the possibility for building Jewish leaders through peer to peer education, lasting friendships and fun, informal Judaic programming that kids remember and cherish for a lifetime.

Camp Kadimah is entering its 67th summer on the beautiful shores of Lake William, two hours outside of Halifax, Nova Scotia. We offer a wide range of activities for children ages 7-16 including arts and crafts, land sports, water-ski and wake-boarding, sailing, canoe and kayak, Red Cross and Royal Lifesaving instructional swim, drama, Israeli song and dance, and scouting. As a proud member of Canadian Young Judaea, our program team and schlichim from Israel ensure fun Zionist content to inspire a knowledge and love of Israel in our campers.

At Kadimah, we take a holistic approach to programming, exposing campers to a full range of programming, including a four day camp wide Maccabia colour war, camping trips to National and Provincial parks, and local sites, theme days, a hockey marathon, and softball, basketball and volleyball house leagues. Optional sport teams, art projects, camping trips, boating races, nature programs with ecologists from nearby universities are some of the ways that campers can involve themselves further in camp life.

Younger campers enjoy a range of special programming including outings to the Atlantic Ocean, local farms, a camp carnival and theme days. Our Machar program, for our oldest campers 14-15 year olds, is designed to be challenging and fun, addressing Israeli culture and politics, as well as Jewish ethics.

Our Counselor In Training (CIT) program gives 16 year olds the chance to experience working on different types of programming throughout camp, working with campers in cabins, and leadership training. The CIT program incorporates volunteer opportunities with local camps and towns to encourage leadership and tzedakah. A 5 day trip in Atlantic Canada promotes CITs learning about local culture, small Jewish Communities, and visit beautiful Atlantic Canada.

Camp Kadimah is a place where generations have danced and sung the same songs. A place of first loves, first accomplishments, and standing ovations. It is a place where kids can feel a part of a community of peers, and be given a chance to shine at what they do best.

Goldstone report refuted

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel refuted allegations of war crimes in a paper detailing its process of investigating its military's actions during the Gaza war.

Last Friday, the Foreign Ministry released the 46-page document describing Israel's procedures for probing allegations of violations of the Law of Armed Conflict.

The paper refuted four of the 36 allegations against Israel of war crimes enumerated in the United Nations' Goldstone Commission report, which accused Israel and the Palestinians of committing war crimes and possible crimes against humanity during the war.

The document focuses on investigations, legal proceedings and lessons learned in relation to Israeli army actions during Operation Cast Lead from Dec. 27, 2008, through Jan. 18, 2009.

The United Nations set a Feb. 5 deadline for the Israel and the Palestinians to carry out independent investigations into the report's findings.

According to a statement from the Foreign Ministry, "Israel's investigative system, like that of many states, includes a range of checks and balances and multiple layers of review to ensure impartiality and independence."

The document reports that "the IDF has launched investigations into 150 separate incidents arising from the Gaza Operation. Of the 150 incidents, 36 have been referred for criminal investigation so far. Criminal investigators have taken statements from almost 100 Palestinian complainants and witnesses, along with approximately 500 IDF soldiers and commanders. In locating Palestinian witnesses and making arrangements for them to give evidence, the IDF works together with local NGOs."

The Israel Defence Forces reportedly will submit a 1,000-page point-by-point rebuttal of the Goldstone report to the United Nations by the deadline.

Rabbi warns of conversion 'catastrophe'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Michael Melchior has had his finger on the pulse of the Jewish nation for some time, as Israel's one-time minister responsible for Diaspora affairs, and currently as head of the Meimad party.

A man who values moderation and accommodation and chooses his words carefully, he nevertheless believes the increasing clout of the haredim over conversions is leading the Jewish world to "catastrophe."

Haredi Jews are slamming the door on conversions that don't comply with "their own narrow, unwelcoming approach," Rabbi Melchior said in a telephone interview from Israel.

Rabbi Michael Melchior

The result has been to leave tens of thousands of potential Jews – mostly Russian olim – in conversion limbo, and diminish the authority of non-haredi Orthodox rabbis around the world.

Despite his harsh words for the haredim, who he says are violating a long-standing halachic principle in rejecting conversions by other Orthodox rabbis, he puts primary responsibility for this development on the wider Orthodox movement.

The haredim, he explained, are simply being haredim. Pushing for an ever-more restrictive interpretation of conversion is an approach that's been developing within haredi circles for 30 to 40 years, beginning in their European centre, Antwerp.

The News in Brief

Canada

Church, CJC Meet

TORONTO — The United Church of Canada and Canadian Jewish Congress were scheduled to meet this week to try to mend fences after Congress objected to the church's ties to a Jewish anti-Zionist group, and after the church considered Israel boycott motions at its General Council last summer. Congress CEO Bernie Farber told the National Post he'd like the national church to repudiate Independent Jewish Voices, which received a small startup grant from the church, and to provide guidance to regional church bodies to end joint projects with the group.

Rapist Faces Jail

TORONTO — A York University graduate who pleaded guilty this month to sexually assaulting two women in a York dormitory during 2007 frosh week will be sentenced March 26. Daniel Katsnelson, 27, and friend Justin Connort, 28, a fellow York grad who is serving jail time for one of the assaults, asked one of the victims, then 17, if she wanted "to get lucky with a couple of Jewish guys," then assaulted her, court heard. After turning himself in and being placed under house arrest, Katsnelson changed his last name to Kaye and started a firm that partnered with the City of Toronto on a card that offered savings at environmentally and socially responsible businesses. A photo of Mayor David Miller and Katsnelson, who faces up to 14 years in jail, was recently removed from Miller's Twitter account.

Gibson Boycott Urged

TORONTO — The Jewish Defence League of Canada is urging Jews to boycott Mel Gibson's new movie, Edge of Darkness, because of what it calls his "past, countless anti-Semitic statements against the Jewish people." During a 2006 drunk-driving arrest, Gibson reportedly said, "F---ng Jews. Jews are responsible for all the wars in the world." He also reportedly asked the arresting officer if he was Jewish. He later apologized.

Jews Named To Order

TORONTO — Three Jewish Torontonians received the Order of Ontario Jan. 28. Businessman Lawrence Bloomberg was honoured for his philanthropy; Dr. Philip Berger was honoured as a leader in urban medicine, and businessman and ex-politician Paul Godfrey was honoured for leadership in municipal governance and creating the Herbie Fund, which funds life-saving surgery for children.

'Rabbah' Like Rabbi

NEW YORK — An Orthodox clergywoman will now be known as "rabbah" rather than by a Hebrew acronym created for her. Last year, Sara Hurwitz, who has been performing rabbinical duties at the Hebrew Institute of Riverdale in New York, was given the title maharat, an acronym that means a leader in legal, spiritual and Torah matters. But Rabbi Avi Weiss, the shul's spiritual leader and Hurwitz's mentor, said the word failed to catch on and she should now be called "rabbah," a feminine version of "rabbi." Hurwitz, who has served at the shul for seven years, has completed the same training as male Orthodox rabbinical students at the liberal Yeshivat Chovevei Torah, which Rabbi Weiss founded and leads.

Liberal MP Backpedals On 'Jaunt' Remark

OTTAWA — Liberal MP Borys Wrzesnewskyj backed away last week from a remark in which he called a trip to Poland by Citizenship and Immigration Minister Jason Kenney a "jaunt," saying he was unaware Kenney was there for the 65th anniversary of Auschwitz's liberation.

The Toronto-area Liberal MP told the Globe and Mail that Canada would have been better served if Kenney had visited Haiti, which continues to face a humanitarian crisis after a devastating earthquake there last month.

In a statement, Wrzesnewskyj "clarified" his initial remarks. "My comments were solely in reference to the timing of Minister Kenney's trip to Poland during the current crisis in Haiti," he said.

"When I spoke to the media, I was not previously aware that a visit to Auschwitz was on the minister's itinerary, and was only made aware of this fact during the interview. In light of this fact, I sincerely regret these comments. I would never trivialize a minister's visit to Auschwitz and especially on the 65th anniversary of its liberation."

B'nai Brith urged Wrzesnewskyj to apologize for his original remark, calling it "despicable." The Prime Minister's Office did the same. In 2006, he resigned as deputy foreign affairs critic after saying Canada should deal directly with Hezbollah, a terrorist group under federal law.

Judge Orders Co-operation In Dispute

VANCOUVER — A Vancouver judge has ordered B'nai Brith Canada, Jack Chivo and five long-standing directors of a Jewish building society to try to settle their dispute over control of the society co-operatively.

B.C. Supreme Court Judge J.S. Sigurdson urged "the parties to meet and resolve this issue by agreement. I expect that possibly with the use of a mediator the sides can resolve this issue internally."

He set aside a Dec. 3 annual general meeting of the Lions' Gate B'nai Brith Building Society, which operates two large seniors residences in downtown Vancouver. He found "irregularities" in the way the meeting was called, and said if left to stand, it would resolve the dispute to the benefit of the Society's "long-standing" members.

At the heart of the conflict, Sigurdson found, was the question of who are legitimate members of the Society.

The Society's bylaws say members must be drawn from Lions Gate Lodge, which has been dormant for years. B'nai Brith appointed an agent in Vancouver to revitalize it, but at the same time, historic members were also attempting to do so. The historic members argued that B'nai Brith has no connection to the Society or the lodge.

The judge declined to rule on who are legitimate members, but added: "In the meantime, I think that a caretaker board should be appointed. The sides will each have three members on the board and will agree on a seventh member…[or] apply for directions if they cannot agree."

Rabbis protest treatment of women at the Kotel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Twenty-nine mostly Reform and Conservative rabbis in the greater Toronto area have signed an open letter to senior Israeli diplomats in Canada expressing deep concern about recent events involving two women who were wearing tallitot at the Kotel.

The letter to Miriam Ziv, Israel's ambassador to Canada, and Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general for Toronto and Western Canada, appears as an advertisement in this week's CJN. It refers to the Nov. 18 arrest of Nofrat Frenkel for wearing a tallit and carrying a Torah, and to the Jan. 5 police questioning and fingerprinting of Anat Hoffman, chair of Women of the Wall, which has organized women's prayer services at the Kotel for the past two decades.

Frenkel and Hoffman were informed that they had violated an Israeli Supreme Court ruling that, citing concerns about public safety, denied women the right to read from the Torah in the regular women's section of the wall. The ruling resulted in the designation of a nearby site, Robinson's Arch, as the place for women to pray as a group with a Torah scroll.

"If this kind of police action had taken place in any other country, the world Jewish community would have accused the state of anti-Semitism and violation of basic human rights," the rabbis wrote.

They ask what steps the Israeli government will take so that "all Jews will be welcome to worship according to their own tradition" at the Kotel.

Rabbi Stephen Wise of Shaarei-Beth El in Oakville, Ont., said the letter was proposed at a meeting of the Reform Rabbis of Greater Toronto. As well, he noted, many of the rabbis have contacted the diplomats directly.

The group contacted other non-Orthodox rabbinical groups, believing the issue would concern their members too, but the rabbis signed the letter individually, not under the auspices of any rabbinic umbrella.

"We thought this was such an important issue that we needed to put an ad out there," said Rabbi Wise. "People need to be aware of it, and become involved.

"A woman was arrested," he stressed. "For wearing a tallit. For us, in the context of pluralism and women's rights… that was like a punch in the stomach."

Gissin told The CJN that when the consulate receives requests about "internal issues," as opposed to foreign policy, "our main role is to pass on the message to the foreign ministry and through it to the Israeli government, and we have done that."

He noted the Reform movement is not a significant segment of the population "at least in terms of numbers" in Israel, but that issues of religious pluralism are always of public interest there.

Ziv couldn't be reached for comment before The CJN's deadline.

Rabbi Wise said that Hoffman has a Canadian connection as a resource person at Camp George, the Reform movement's summer camp in Parry Sound, Ont., for the past few years.

Rabbi Michael Dolgin of Temple Sinai Congregation, added that Hoffman has spoken at a number of synagogues here and has met with Toronto-area synagogue groups when they were visiting Israel.

"There seems to be freedom of religion for everyone but Jews [in Israel]," said Rabbi Dolgin. "As a supporter of Israel, I hope to see that changed… Israel is stronger when all the kinds of Jewish identity and practice can take root."

In addition to the letter, ARZA Canada: The Zionist Voice of the Canadian Reform Movement has an online petition addressed to Ziv, to support Hoffman and the Israel Religious Action Center, the advocacy arm of the Reform movement in Israel.

Also, a public prayer service to support Women of the Wall: will take place Feb. 14 (Rosh Chodesh Adar), at 10 a.m., at the Prosserman JCC.

Powerful pronouncements

The images in this column of Israel's President Shimon Peres addressing the Deutscher Bundestag (German Parliament) evoke strong feelings and emotions.

"If only," we ask ourselves rhetorically, but then quickly cast the cruel question aside.

Peres was in Berlin on Jan. 27, International Holocaust Memorial Day.

While Peres was in Berlin, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was in Poland, where he spoke at the remnant of the Auschwitz death camp.

It was deeply significant as well as profoundly symbolic that Israel's head of state, Peres, and its head of government, Netanyahu, were at the very places that were the co-epicentres, 65 years ago, of the vast vortex of the Nazi evil that swirled its genocidal path across most of Europe.

It was on Jan. 27, 1945, that the advancing Soviet army threw open the gates of Auschwitz-Birkenau. We know what they saw. As Irwin Cotler has said, what they saw was too terrible to imagine, but not too terrible to have happened.

Jan. 27 has become the date in the international arena to consider the Holocaust and its universal implications.

Nissan 27 is the date in the Jewish calendar when the Jewish People commemorates Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah.

On April 12, 1951, the Knesset declared 27 Nissan as Yom Hashoah U'Mered HaGetaot (Holocaust and Ghetto Revolt Remembrance Day). The name of the commemoration soon evolved to the current Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah.

That particular date in Nissan was selected because of the uprising in the Warsaw Ghetto. Typical of the Nazis' unique sadism, they began their assault on the ghetto on the first day of Pesach 1943. To ensure that the commemoration of the Nazis' destruction of European Jewry did not coincide with the celebration of the Exodus from ancient Egypt, Yom Hashoah was fixed for later in the month.

From that eerie podium in Poland, Netanyahu told the assembly of dignitaries and the world: "The most important lesson from the Shoah is that murderous evil must be stopped as soon as possible, before it can realize its schemes." This was clearly an unveiled reference to the possibility of nuclear menace from Iran.

The prime minister then made a statement that he knew would be heard by his countrymen and most Jews around the world. He intended it as well for the decision-makers in Tehran.

"I pledge as prime minister that we will never let the hand of evil harm our people and our state. Never again."

Speaking in Hebrew, Peres delivered a pointed, impassioned speech that depicted in both personal and collective references the nature of Jewish history during the last century and the nature of Jewish aspirations in this century.

He spoke both poetically and plainly, neither skirting nor dwelling upon the pain of the past, nor avoiding essential truths that must have sounded uncomfortable to some of the members of the Bundestag.

"In the State of Israel, and across the world, survivors of the Holocaust are gradually departing from the world of the living. Their numbers are daily diminishing.

"And at the same time, men and women who took part in the most odious activity on earth – that of genocide – still live on German and European soil, and in other parts of the world.

"My request of you is: please do everything to bring them to justice.

"This is not revenge in our eyes. This is an educational lesson... for the young generation, wherever they may be. That they may remember and never forget, that they should know what took place..."

Peres' words cut to the heart of a great many issues pressing against the Jewish heart today. He concluded with the words of Hatikvah.

On the same day, not too far away from Berlin and Auschwitz, Nobel Peace Prize laureate Elie Wiesel delivered a major address to the Italian parliament.

He too chose not to allow the moment to pass without saying what needed to be said.

He criticized Pope Pius XII, albeit without pronouncing his name.

"Whether at the lowest level of politics or the highest level of spirituality, silence never helps the victims. Silence always helps the aggressor."

When asked subsequently to clarify the reference, a spokesperson for Wiesel confirmed that "highest level of spirituality" was indeed an allusion to Pius XII who was pope during World War II. The criticism by Wiesel was therefore also criticism of Pope Benedict's current efforts to beatify Pope Pius.

By any estimation, the cumulative impact of the three presentations by these three very special and very significant men of Jewish life was a powerful pronouncement of Jewish survival, presence and permanence 65 years after the Shoah.

WHAT A WARSAW GHETTO BUNKER LOOKED LIKE

As part of the commemoration of International Holocaust Memorial Day last week on January 27, the Holocaust History Museum at Kibbutz Yad Mordechai assembled a display of a restored ground bunker in the Warsaw ghetto from 1943. The kibbutz is named after Mordechai Anielewicz, one of the leaders of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising against the Nazis.

Israel the focus of modern anti-Semitism, scholar says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Contemporary anti-Semitism largely turns on delegitimizing Israel, says the author of an encyclopedic work on the history of this ageless phenomenon.

"Anti-Semitism in 2010 is focused primarily around the delegitimization of the state of Israel, blaming it for all the turmoil in the Middle East and beyond," Hebrew University historian Robert Wistrich said in an interview last week.

Widely known as the dean of historians of anti-Semitism, he was on a tour of the United States to publicize his latest book, A Lethal Obsession: Anti-Semitism from Antiquity to the Global Jihad, published by Random House earlier this month.

Wistrich, the director of the Vidal Sassoon International Center for the Study of Anti-Semitism, said that anti-Semites prey on Israel.

"Israel's existence and the desire to annihilate it is the main trigger, pretext and rationalization for anti-Semites today – whether from the right or the left, or from religious or secular."

Robert Wistrich

Asked if Israeli policies fan anti-Semitism, he replied, "Obviously any action by Israel in its own self-defence or self-interest will provoke more hostility. This is a deadly trap, a harsh cycle that must be broken."

Describing anti-Semitism as a "deadly cocktail" of racist conspiracy themes, hostility to the West, demonization of Israel and "a spineless appeasement of Islamic extremism," Wistrich claimed it is wrapped in "a truly mendacious facade of caring about human rights."

He expressed concern regarding the growing respectability of "anti-Semitic discourse" on university campuses .

"I am particularly concerned by the hostility to Israel – and to Jews who defend Israel – on some Canadian college campuses. It comes mainly from the pro-Palestinian left and Muslim students – what I call the Red-Green axis."

In his book, he writes: "There is a return to the advocacy of economic and academic boycotts, as well as to the more subtle forms of social ostracism directed against Jews who support Israel."

Asked at what point anti-Zionism morphs into anti-Semitism, he said, "Most anti-Zionism no longer needs to become anti-Semitic – it crossed that line some time ago."

Criticism of Israel's policies is one thing, he noted. "It is a normal part of democratic life. The most severe critics of Israel live in Israel, but except for some pathological cases in academia, they are ready to defend their country."

But demonization is totally different, Wistrich added. "It seeks the death of the individual Jew, the demise of Israeli society and the end of Jewish national existence."

Charging that anti-Semitism is "deeply ingrained" in the body politics of Islam and the culture of the Arab world and Iran, he said that Holocaust denial is "a kind of state doctrine" in Iran's Islamic republic today and is very popular in Arab countries.

Calling Holocaust denial an integral component of modern anti-Semitism, Wistrich warned it is "a highly toxic phenomenon with genocidal implications."

Compared to the anti-Semitism of the Muslim world, anti-Semitism in such European countries as Germany and Poland is much weaker than it was before World War II. "But the far right there is still viciously anti-Jewish," he said.

Wistrich pointed out that "a strong guilt complex" about the Holocaust in Germany and eastern Europe sometimes produces "defensive anti-Semitic reactions."

In his opinion, anti-Semitism seems to be on the upswing in most western nations, including Canada.

"The United States is probably the least anti-Jewish of the leading western democracies, but it is by no means immune to infection."

Wistrich is critical of the Vatican's current effort to beatify Pope Pius XII, whom critics say was virtually silent during the Holocaust.

"He was certainly no hero, nor a great friend of the Jews. We should, however, wait till the Vatican archives are open before passing a more conclusive judgment."

The author of such works as Socialism and the Jews (1982), Antisemitism: The Longest Hatred (1992) and Islamic Judeophobia (2004), Wistrich said his current book, A Lethal Obsession, is "the most comprehensive study yet made by any scholar on global anti-Semitism, especially as it has existed since 1945."

He said he wrote it as "a guide for the perplexed in our generation, not as a definitive solution to the eternal riddle of anti-Semitism."

Wistrich, who will turn 65 in April, was born in Kazakhstan, the son of Polish Jews who fled Poland after Germany's invasion in 1939.

Upon earning a PhD from the University of London, he was chosen director of research at the Institute of Contemporary Research and the Weiner Library in London. After joining the staff at Hebrew U, he was appointed director of the Vidal Sassoon International Center for the Study of Anti-Semitism.

The centre publishes Antisemitism International, an annual research journal, and oversees the activities of the Felix Posen Bibliographic Project, the world's most comprehensive bibliography of materials on anti-Semitism.

Abbas goes down the up staircase

Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas was in Moscow last week for talks with Russian President Dmitry Medvedev. One should be able to assume he was there to explain the subtle nuances of his Mideast policies to his Russian counterpart in an earnest endeavour to advance the peace process with the Jewish state.

That may not be a valid assumption.

Abbas' policies are hardly nuanced, let alone subtly so.

He repeated his peace-strangling mantra that he will not return to the negotiations table until Israel stops all construction in east Jerusalem. "If I engage in negotiations while construction goes on, they will say that it is theirs, since I was willing to resume talks while construction continued," he told an Arabic -language Russian TV news program.

Abbas avoided telling his interviewer, however, that he had no apparent difficulty at all in negotiating with previous governments of Israel while the Jews were building in east Jerusalem.

But the PA president last week added a new, surrealistic level to his solipsistic syllogisms regarding his refusal to sit at a table with Israel. As reported in the Jerusalem Post, when asked if would acknowledge Israel to be the homeland of the Jewish people, "Abbas said that this demand appeared only in the 1947 UN partition plan, hinting that Israel would have to implement that plan in order to gain recognition as a Jewish state."

Abbas' silly musings slight Palestinian sensibilities even as they mock anyone genuinely striving to move the process forward.

The Jews in Mandatory Palestine (or Palestinians, as they were then called) did accept the partition plan. It was the Arab League and the local leaders of the disparate Arab groupings in Mandatory Palestine who did not. The Arabs inside and outside Mandatory Palestine launched a war to exterminate the Jews. But the Jews refused to be exterminated.

Is Abbas coyly suggesting the Arabs should have accepted partition in 1947? Hardly. He is, rather, suggesting that he can no more recognize Israel as a Jewish state than the leaders of Israel today can revert to the 1947 Partition Plan.

Instead of moving up, even if tentatively and slowly, on the staircase toward a platform of discussions and negotiations, the PA president is actually clomping his clumsy way down.

He offers his people no hope. And equally problematic for the future, he offers the Israeli people no hope.

Abbas is entrenching diplomatic stalemate and political atrophy.

One of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's key security advisors, Uzi Arad, warned on the weekend that "the Palestinian policy of refusal to negotiate will become a problem for the Palestinians." It already has.

Abbas should sit down with Netanyahu and start talking.

25 years ago in The CJN

Israeli defence minister Yitzhak Rabin wrapped up three days of talks in Washington, D.C., with U.S. president Ronald Reagan and other administration officials by thanking Reagan for increasing U.S. military assistance to Israel in the fiscal year by $400 million (US). Rabin had asked for a $300-million increase as Israel faced an economic crisis that forced the government to institute austerity measures.

Anti-Semitism at Concordia U

As a former Concordia University student, I like to return to that infamous campus that rioted on the occasion of the current prime minister of Israel, Benjamin Netanyahu's visit, in September 2002, just to see what's going on. From reading the current student newspapers and listening to the students, I feel that the campus is as anti-Israel and anti-Semitic as ever.

I can't see how Jewish students can feel comfortable on that campus currently, though I commend them for trying, as I did, to get an education there. I think resources from the Jewish community should be allocated to help the students of Concordia stave off the nastiness emanating from the hallways of Concordia.

This is also important as Concordia serves as a breeding ground for anti-Israel and anti-Jewish feeling in the wider island of Montreal and, by extension, the rest of Quebec.

A midrash about trees

Rachel Turkienicz's column "Not a Jewish Arbor Day at all" (Jan. 14) completely overlooks and somewhat disparages what Zionists, from atheist secular to modern Orthodox, have made of Tu b'Shvat. It is a holiday not about "orlah," "counting" or the haredi cutting of a young boy's hair to give him that Ashkenazi minhag called "payes" (which these days is celebrated on Lag b'Omer), but rather it has become a midrash about trees, fruit, reforestation and the redemption of the Land of Israel and concern for its future through a concern for its ecology. It has been a Zionist holiday for more than 100 years, and the omission of that insight is a serious oversight.

Tzedakah is an obligation

Daniel Held's column "Can we match the Mormons?" (Jan. 7) raises a poignant concern for our community – one that is all too often swept under the rug because, paradoxically, Toronto is so generous here and in Israel.

I ask how many of us appreciate that tzedakah is not a choice, but an obligation – a responsibility! It may contribute to Jewish ethical living, but it is not why one ought to be giving. And it has little to do with our level of maturity or sophistication.

But how do we get the almost 80 per cent who don't give at all to "get" what the other 20 get at some level? And how do we get people to appreciate what, in fact, is an appropriate gift at all? I open up these questions, to add to those raised by Held in his column, and would love to see some thoughts published in future *CJN*s.

Holocaust commemoration

On this International Day of Commemoration in Memory of the Victims of the Holocaust (Jan. 27), I want to join in today's remembrance of the countless victims who lost their lives and those who have forever lived with the scars of this human tragedy.

In paying my respects at Yad Vashem in Israel, I learned the stories of countless victims. Today, 65 years after the liberation of the Auschwitz concentration camp, we remember the inherent evil that is possible when civil liberties are suspended, freedom is denied, and the barbarity of hate emerges in their place.

On behalf of the Ontario Progressive Conservative caucus, I want to restate our condemnation of all attempts to deny and minimize the Holocaust and all crimes against humanity. Together, we join with the Jewish community and bear witness to the Shoah and the determination to live up to the survivors' creed: "Never again."

Machal Archives

Thank you for publishing Ralph Lowenstein's article on North American Machal, "North American volunteers for Israel: 'no one knows about us'" (Chanukah supplement, Dec. 10). For 30 years, Lowenstein, a University of Florida professor, has been gathering information for the Machal Archives that he established there.

Upon Lowenstein's retirement, and with the co-operation of the board of the American and Canadian Veterans of Israel, we have formed a relationship with the American Jewish Historical Society (AJHS). The AJHS will move the archives from Florida to their New York City museum and make them available to researchers, at the society and on the Internet, by the fall of 2010.

Some observations on the conversion crisis

By RABBI REUVEN P. BULKA

The Canadian Jewish News was right, and right on, in calling for unity (Jan. 14) in the face of the latest conversion crisis. Two articles on this matter also appeared, one by Rabbi Marc D. Angel in that same issue, and a followup rebuttal by Rabbi Reuven Tradburks on Jan. 21. In their disagreement, there was an obvious agreement that unity is vital. The question at hand is how best to achieve it.

I know both these distinguished rabbis and am singularly aware of their passionate commitment to the long-range welfare of our community – here, in Israel and everywhere else. So what I share with you herein is in no way to be construed as criticism of these rabbis. It's more a personal reflection on the issue as it has developed and on the background of what once was.

Usually, I try to keep away from these matters in a public forum, but the issue at hand is so serious, and the comments from a variety of sources – blogs, shmogs and other places where people can throw garbage with impunity, so misleading and damaging, that I have broken with my past policy. I have no illusions that what I write will make a difference. But I also know that being silent will certainly not make a difference.

In response to Rabbi Angel's plea for a return to a decentralized conversion system, Rabbi Tradburks argues that there is a "wide range of conversion standards among Orthodox rabbis." He is correct on the fact. There is a good reason for this wide range. It is because there is an at least equally wide range of standards within Jewish law (Halachah) on the matter of conversion.

There are three ingredients in conversion. They are 1. Acceptance of the Judaism "package;" 2. Covenantal circumcision (males only), and 3. Immersion in the mikvah waters.

Items 2 and 3 are clear. Item 1, which falls under the well-known umbrella of kabbalat hamitzvot, acceptance of the host of Jewish obligations, is not so clear. Without getting into how kabbalat hamitzvot in its present form became such an integral component of conversion, it's vital to appreciate that the range of understanding of this concept is quite staggering. On the one end of the spectrum is a view, from a respected Jewish luminary, that just to remove a person from idolatry, even absent acceptance of basic Jewish affirmations (i.e., Shabbat, kashrut, etc.), is adequate justification for proceeding with a conversion.

On the other end is a view that only the promise and "guarantee" of total compliance with every detail of Jewish law is justification for proceeding with a conversion.

It's fair to say that most conversions until recently operated somewhere within this broad spectrum insofar as addressing the matter of kabbalat hamitzvot.

And there were many leading rabbis of great stature as rabbinic scholars who were "lenient" by any standard. Some would ask only that the conversion prospect read a book detailing all the major Jewish observances and then come back within a month. I was admittedly a bit leery about the validity of such conversions, and approached a great talmudic luminary to ask whether such conversions are acceptable.

The response was remarkable. This great sage admitted that the conversion standards of that rabbi were "different" than that of others, but at the same time this was a man of integrity and scholarship, and there is no way his conversions can be rejected. That was the climate of the times 20 or 30 years ago. The lament is that this climate no longer exists. It's easy to be united when everyone is the same, but it's much more challenging when we have differences.

In my own personal experience, I was astounded to encounter at least five different situations wherein a couple went to another city to a different but at least equally respected rabbi, whose wife taught the prospective convert for an hour in the morning, then took her to the rabbinic court for her to affirm her embrace of Judaism, followed by immersion in the mikvah that same day, after which the (fervently Orthodox) rabbi married the couple in the afternoon. I do not recommend such a practice, but it was done, and accepted by the community.

It's true that we will have disunity if rabbis reject the conversions of others. But there would be no disunity if there was mutual respect and acceptance. Unfortunately, what once was no longer is. Once, rabbis accepted the conversions of others, even if the conversions operated with different standards. There was no delegitimizing. Just the opposite.

I do not dismiss out of hand the issue of differing standards. But it should be clear that conversion parameters are hardly likely to be the same in smaller cities with less Jewish resources than in larger cities. In Canada, there are some cities with no Jewish schools. We could not, in the past, insist that the converting person assure that his or her children would go to a Jewish school. But there is nothing wrong and everything right with pushing for this in a city that has Jewish schools, or a Jewish school.

In this regard, it has been related to me (second hand, so I cannot vouch for it) that a leading Jewish sage of the previous generation, when asked by his ordained students in rabbinic positions what to push for in regard to kabbalat hamitzvot for conversion, told them to do the best they can. This further reinforces the idea that there is a wide range of understanding regarding this component of conversion, as it should be.

What is further lamentable in this situation is that we are now seeing the ugly spectacle of already in-place conversions being questioned. That is beyond lamentable. It is objectionable. It is one thing to set standards for going forward, even if these standards are open to debate. It is quite another to retroactively call into question pre-existing conversions, thereby throwing an entire community of sincere, well-meaning convert families into turmoil. That has to stop. There is simply no excuse for this delegitimizing. I am confident that the Rabbinical Council of America will stand up to this unacceptable invasion of yesterday's rabbinate.

I would love to see a return to the trusting ways of the past, or at least a move in that direction, even if it be with more defined parameters. The train may have already left the station on this, but maybe the opportunity still remains. I certainly hope so.

In the interests of full disclosure, I share with you, the readers, that I was involved in conversion for many years. I entered into this arena very reluctantly, as no other rabbi in my area was willing to do this. I could not accept that congregational rabbis who are entrusted with Jewish posterity refuse to address a most pressing issue, and in many instances even boast that they never did a conversion. Because I am closer to retirement, I have opted not to continue with conversions and instead have referred them to a rabbinic court in Montreal of a most trustworthy group of rabbis, whose bona fides are ironically being unfairly challenged by Israel's rabbinic authorities.

My conversions, at first finalized outside Ottawa and eventually finalized in my Rabbinical Council of America-approved bet din in Ottawa, probably would be classified as being more in the centre regarding the understanding of kabbalat hamitzvot. Given a choice between having strict conversion standards and more welcoming ones, I would always err on the side of "welcome." After the proverbial 120 years, I would much rather answer why I welcomed more Jews than why I prevented more people from becoming Jewish.

Like most other rabbis who have done conversions, not all have been resounding successes. No rabbinic court, however strict, has a perfect record. But we should not stop conversions for that reason any more than we should stop marrying couples because a large percentage of marriages collapse in divorce. And the vast majority – the converts who remain fully Jewish – have been a great source of pride and joy, both personally and communally. God bless them.

Opinions

From the centre to the middle

After a spirited exploration of Reform Judaism two years earlier, last December, the Van Leer Institute in Jerusalem held a similar two-day conference on Conservative Judaism. The event took place in the shadow of the movement's difficulties, not the least of which can be seen in Canada, where several former constituent synagogues have formed a union of their own.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Conservative Judaism has always seen itself as being in the centre, the authentic exponent of normative Judaism that affirms Halachah while, with historic precedent, advocating change in the spirit of the time. It distanced itself from ultra-halachic Orthodoxy and from anti-halachic "informed choice" classical Reform. But this had been easier than to find a place in our post-halachic New Age, which attracts so many today.

The normative Conservative motto of yesteryear, "tradition and change," doesn't seem to work well anymore. What set out to be magisterially centrist has ended up uncomfortably in the middle, often accused of being brittle and wishy-washy.

A word used by several speakers at the conference was "branding," with its implied marketing connotations. It seems that the market in which Conservative Judaism is now competing is less interested in the centre, yet doesn't want to go to the middle. Those who want tradition turn to modern Orthodoxy, which they consider to be more authentic. Those who want change turn to versatile Reform. To paraphrase the terminology of the Canadian sociologist Reginald Bibby, Jews hungry for a conventional religious diet turn to Orthodox Judaism. Those who want what he calls "religion a la carte" often choose Reform.

Conservative Judaism is now seeking an ideology that's sufficiently different from Orthodoxy yet distinct, especially in matters of Jewish status, from Reform. It's not easy, because those on its "right" tend to flirt with modern Orthodoxy, whereas those on the "left" may end up in Reform or similar congregations.

Conservative leaders are particularly disappointed that they haven't done better in Israel. Though they have twice as many congregations and many more members than Reform, they're no less shunned by the Orthodox establishment. They also seem to be ignored in most "post-secular spirituality" circles.

I surmise that, given the choice, many exponents of Conservative Judaism would be prepared to be adopted by modern Israeli Orthodoxy, but they're not welcome there. Reform, on the other hand, would be happy to make common cause with them, yet those overtures are being consistently rejected.

Conservative Jews, therefore, may have to get used to sharing the fate of today's religious liberals and learn to live as a minority, even when they wear kippot and keep kosher.

Teachers as priests and prophets

Last month in this space, I wrote about leadership, and I'd like to extend the qualities of a good leader to the role of an effective teacher. If you remember, I used as my example the film Invictus. The notion was that just as Nelson Mandela provided a vision of a new South Africa in the prophetic sense, that vision required something tangible that the common folk, white and black, could identify with. In the case of South Africa, that was the Rugby World Cup, and its "priest" was Pienaar of the Springboks.

Seymour Epstein in Toronto

If teachers are indeed leaders, they, too, must practice a dialectic between two modes of operation. I turn from Mandela to Apple CEO Steve Jobs. Recently, Rick Spence of the Financial Post reviewed a book about Jobs' leadership at Apple that details the success of his presentation skills, or how he teaches. What hit me the hardest was that Jobs is referred to as the "master of disruption."

Jobs carefully designs his presentations and uses a variety of techniques to transmit his message and convince his audience. His cool attire of turtleneck, jeans, and sneakers puts him in a comfort zone for both himself and his "students."

Lesson number 1: be yourself and feel right in your own skin (as the French say). Teachers who act out some persona of what they think a teacher should be only aggravate the artificial (even phony) nature of a classroom. Real life does not consist of 40 minutes of geography followed by 40 minutes of Chumash. School is already a fake environment. Teachers need not contribute more artifice.

Lesson number 2: in an ideal situation, the authentic self of the teacher is someone the students can identify with, be comfortable around and, hopefully, emulate as a model. Teachers who represent a planet other than the one the students inhabit are doomed. In my Moroccan years, I was impressed by teachers who had not completed high school and had no pedagogic training, but came from the same streets as their pupils, ate the same food and prayed in the same synagogues. The mutual respect was a major factor in their pedagogy.

So, if comfort on both sides is so important, why is disruption a quality of teaching that I favour? It is precisely the teacher who is at ease with his/her students and with whom the learners identify who can best use disruption as a teaching tool. Disruption – changing paradigms, upsetting the norm, confusing the convinced – is the function of a pedagogue who is trusted by students. It's in the shift from comfort to confusion that true learning begins. You have nothing to learn if your complacency convinces you that you know it all. But if the one who knows more (the original meaning of "rav" or rabbi), whom you respect, lets you in on new and surprising information, your field of knowledge is disrupted and must change.

This is as true of the next equation in algebra as it is of the wild and wonderful midrash you never dreamed existed in the rabbinic corpus. It's just as true of yet another moral imperative of our value system. In order for children to grow from dependence to autonomy, they must be as disrupted intellectually and emotionally, as were the Israelite slaves in Egypt on their path to freedom. I have often felt that the reason we are commanded to teach our children the Exodus story every year is because they, like our slave ancestors, must traverse a similar process of learning autonomy and responsibility after a childhood of carefree dependence.

And so, while leaders must balance the prophetic vision with priestly service, teachers must constantly maintain a dialogue between the comfort zone they represent and the shift or disruption they teach. As expected from me, this is not about continuity, a term which does no credit to education. This process is about creativity and growth.

If you're a parent and not a classroom teacher, just substitute parent for all the references to teachers above. We are all of us teachers and leaders.

Remembering Abraham Sutzkever

His words strove to retrieve and lament a lost world and a wounded language. Now we mark the passing of the Yiddish poet Abraham (Avrom) Sutzkever, in late January in Tel Aviv. Arguably the finest Yiddish poet of the 20th century, Sutzkever saw two world wars, the decimation of European Jewry and the renewal of Jewish life in Israel. Through everything, he continued to write stunning poems, developing a corpus of work that reflects his intense commitment to Jewish life, culture and the Yiddish language.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Born in Lithuania in 1913, Sutzkever was raised in Vilna, after a brief sojourn in Siberia. Between the two world wars, he was part of a group of Yiddish Vilna writers called Yung Vilne, or young Vilna, which included the novelist Chaim Grade and the poet Shmerke Kaczerginski. The group rejected the notion that Yiddish literature was obligated to have a social or political purpose. The lyric poems he wrote reflected the world of nature and his sense of self in the world.

But like other Yiddish poets of his generation, both in Europe and in America, with the rise of Nazism and dire persecution of Jews, Sutzkever's writing took on a more pointed sense of purpose. Sutzkever and his family were taken to the Vilna Ghetto in 1941. His mother and his young son were murdered there. During his time there, until the ghetto's destruction in 1943, he composed more than eighty poems that reflected both his personal losses as well as the collective losses and suffering of the ghetto Jews, capturing the pervasive death that was their everyday life.

In his 1942 poem, Burnt Pearls, the image of the title serves as a metaphor for the ghetto dead. The poem meditates on the impossible task of Yiddish poetry amid the devastation of the European Jewish, where "you, written word, substitute for my world." At the same time, his continued output reflected a stubborn commitment to the possibilities of language and literature. In many ways, this steady act of writing sustained him through unspeakably difficult times.

This prolific writing under impossible circumstances was an integral part of a web of activity that occupied Sutzkever in the Vilna Ghetto. He established literary groups to foster creative writing and culture in the ghetto. At the same time, he became active in the ghetto's underground. At great personal risk, he succeeded in rescuing important Jewish cultural artifacts, concealing YIVO documents, books and drawings in the ghetto. He was able to retrieve these hidden treasures after war.

Sutzkever wrote of the intertwining of armed and spiritual resistance in his 1943 poem, The Lead Plates at the Rom Press. Located in Vilna, the Rom Press was an important publisher of Jewish books and most famous for publishing the definitive edition of the Talmud. The ghetto underground devised a plan to melt down its lead printing plates in order to manufacture ammunition. Sutzkever imagines the molten metal containing "the spirit" of its melted letters, embodying Jewish culture, experience, creativity: "Liquefied bullets, gleamed with thoughts:/A verse from Babylon, a verse from Poland."

Upon the liquidation of the Vilna Ghetto in 1943, Sutzkever succeeded in escaping with his wife, Freydke, to the nearby Naroch forest, where they joined up with the partisans. Eventually, he was flown to Moscow, rescued because one of his wartime poems had been published there, and its power made it useful for Stalin's efforts to win international support for the war against Germany. In 1946, he testified in the Nuremberg trials, and the following year he and Freydke moved to Tel Aviv.

There, amid the flowering of modern Hebrew, Sutzkever continued to write Yiddish poems, and to nurture Yiddish culture. His work embraces the Israeli landscape while retrieving the European past. He founded an important Yiddish literary quarterly called Di Goldene keyt, or the golden chain, which he edited for half a century.

When he died at age 96, he left behind a brilliant body of writing and a striking legacy.

Yehi zichro boruch – may his memory be a blessing.

The Kirshner File

Is George Mitchell on an impossible mission?

George Mitchell, the special U.S. envoy to the Middle East, has learned once more that it takes two to tango. A year after President Barack Obama tasked him with the mission of reviving Israel's on-again, off-again peace process with the Palestinian Authority, which collapsed at the end of 2008, Mitchell appears to have reached a dead end, like virtually all his predecessors since the 1967 Six Day War.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Obama has reason to be concerned. Two weeks ago, he told Time magazine he might have raised expectations too high and "overestimated" his administration's ability to forge meaningful diplomatic progress. "I'll be honest with you," he said. "This is just really hard. Even for a guy like George Mitchell."

Obama attributed the impasse to three interrelated factors: the Palestinian Authority's fear that concessions to Israel may deepen its increasingly bitter struggle with its rival, Hamas, which calls for the destruction of Israel; Israel's difficulty in making "bold gestures" to the Palestinians, and the Arab world's impatience with the stagnation and its refusal to normalize relations with Israel unless it ends its "illegal occupation" of the West Bank and the Golan Heights.

If Mitchell fails, it will be a case of deja vu all over again.

A decade ago, following the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising, the outgoing president of the United States, Bill Clinton, asked Mitchell to study the upsurge of violence and make recommendations for tamping it down. Mitchell, delivering a report to Clinton's successor, George W. Bush, called for a truce and confidence-building measures so that talks between Israel and the Palestinians could be restarted. As well, he urged the Palestinian Authority to crack down on terrorism and Israel to cease all settlement activity in the territories.

Though Mitchell's recommendations were endorsed by Israel and the Palestinian Authority, they were not implemented. In fact, they were folded into the 2003 "road map" peace plan, which eventually withered on the vine. The then-president of the Palestinian Authority, Yasser Arafat, would not or could not rein in Palestinian attacks, while Israel's prime minister, Ariel Sharon, rejected the very concept of a settlement freeze.

Despite his failure to reconcile the clashing visions of Israelis and Palestinians, Mitchell accepted Obama's appointment as special representative to the Mideast. Obama had high hopes that Mitchell – a skilled negotiator of Irish and Lebanese Maronite descent who brokered the 1998 Good Friday peace agreement in Northern Ireland and who served as U.S. Senate majority leader– might succeed in untangling Israel's century-long, intractable conflict with the Palestinians.

Last January, in what was described as a "listening tour," Mitchell set out for the Middle East, saying his objective was to achieve a two-state solution within the framework of stability and security. On April 15, two weeks after Benjamin Netanyahu's right-of-centre government was sworn in, Mitchell embarked on his inaugural working trip to Israel and the Palestinian territories, repeating the mantra that the best way to resolve the conflict was through the creation of an independent Palestinian state coexisting with Israel.

Since then, Mitchell has become a regular visitor to Jerusalem and Ramallah, the de facto capital of the Palestinian Authority.

On his last visit to the region late last month, he conferred with, among others, Netanyahu and President Mahmoud Abbas of the Palestinian Authority, his main interlocutors.

Mitchell failed to lure Abbas back to the negotiating table, with Abbas saying he would not resume talks until Israel agreed to a full settlement freeze in the West Bank and eastern Jerusalem. Israel announced a partial 10-month freeze last November, infuriating Jewish settlers. The United States praised it as a positive step forward, but the Palestinians dismissed it as a disingenuous and half-baked ploy designed to appease Obama.

Nor did Mitchell make any substantial headway with Netanyahu, notwithstanding his support for an immediate resumption of negotiations without conditions. Within hours of conferring with Mitchell, he reaffirmed that Israel would retain the Gush Etzion bloc and two of the largest settlements in the West Bank, Maale Adumim and Ariel.

In the face of Mitchell's latest setback, Israel's defence minister, Ehud Barak, warned last week that the unresolved Palestinian problem poses a greater threat to Israel than a nuclear-armed Iran, a view not shared by Netanyahu. Though Barak admitted that the peace process is frozen, he predicted that negotiations would resume by March.

Barak's optimism seems like an exercise in wishful thinking, given the atmosphere of mutual suspicion and mistrust. Yet Barak may be on to something. Before leaving Israel on Jan. 25, Mitchell submitted a proposal to Abbas suggesting that talks should focus on confidence-building measures to improve conditions in the West Bank for Palestinians rather than on volatile core issues such as the final borders of a future Palestinian state and the fate of Palestinian refugees.

If the Palestinians embrace Mitchell's plan, Israel could remove more roadblocks in the West Bank, release additional Palestinian prisoners, reopen Orient House in East Jerusalem and expand Area A in the West Bank, where the Palestinians possess both civil and security control.

Even if his proposal is acceptable to Abbas, Mitchell will still be a long way off from achieving his goal of a two-state solution, since Israel and the Palestinian Authority are so far apart on both minor and major issues. For the past few months, Abbas has consistently said he will not renew talks unless Israel stops all construction in the West Bank and eastern Jerusalem, recognizes the 1967 borders of a Palestinian state and agrees to resume negotiations where they left off in December 2008.

Abbas and Netanyahu's predecessor, Ehud Olmert, met regularly to thrash out their differences. On the eve of his resignation, stemming from a widening corruption scandal, Olmert proposed a far-reaching territorial swap. In exchange for annexing 6.3 per cent of the West Bank – home to 75 per cent of Jewish settlers – Israel would transfer 5.8 per cent of its pre-1967 territory to the Palestinians. Although Olmert's offer was unprecedented in its generosity, Abbas did not respond, correctly assuming that Olmert's days as premier were numbered.

Netanyahu, given his track record and his reliance on coalition partners that staunchly oppose real territorial compromise, is not likely to be as forthcoming as Olmert.

Since the beginning of 2010, while repeatedly urging Abbas to negotiate with him and "stop wasting time," he has set down several markers that the Palestinians have roundly denounced. Fearing rocket attacks from the West Bank, like those emanating from the Gaza Strip and Lebanon, Netanyahu has said that Israel must maintain a permanent presence in the Jordan Valley, along the eastern border of a future Palestinian state.

In addition, he has declared that Israel will never cede control of east Jerusalem, where the Palestinians wish to establish their capital, or retreat to the 1967 armistice lines. Netanyahu, too, has warned that the settlement moratorium is a "one time, temporary" move, while his foreign minister, Avigdor Lieberman, has said that Israel has emptied its "arsenal of gestures," including the reduction of roadblocks, to the Palestinians.

In spite of the formidable obstacles that lie ominously ahead, the United States is determined to push ahead, warning that delay is in no one's interest and only makes things worse. Clearly, Mitchell has an immense job on his hands.

Call it mission impossible.

New strain of Holocaust denial, lawyer says

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

There's standard Holocaust-denial and then there's the new version. Call it Holocaust denial 2.0.

In the "standard" variety, the argument is that Hitler did not want to kill the Jews or that Hitler did not, in fact, kill the Jews. For proponents of that view, think Ernst Zundel or David Irving.

The "new" strain of Holocaust denial "denies the specificity of the Holocaust" or attempts to use it as a weapon against the State of Israel, insisting that what the Israelis are doing to the Palestinians is pretty much what the Germans did to the Jews.

Think far left and radical Islamists for advocates of that view.

Anthony Julius is a British lawyer who witnessed first hand the excesses of Nazi apologists, having successfully defended historian Deborah Lipstadt in a notorious libel case brought by history writer David Irving. Julius will be in Toronto to deliver two lectures on Feb. 13 and 14 as part of a 10-day seminar of the Mark and Gail Appel Program for Holocaust and anti-Racism Education at York University.

The first lecture is titled "Holocaust Denial: What's the Point." The second is "How Can Good Literature Be Bad for the Jews?"

Anthony Julius

In a telephone interview from London, Julius said the two strains of new and old anti-Semitism can be seen converging in rhetoric that's common to both. In 1925, a notorious British Nazi referred to Jews as "scum" who were intent on driving Palestinians out of their land.

"That's close to the language of current anti-Israel activists," minus the reference to "scum," he said.

Back then, the extremists were "romanticizing the Arabs, the rural Bedouin, and deprecating the urban Jew."

Today, "they romanticize the radical Palestinian resister and disparage the Israeli army..." The one continuing theme is anti-Semitism and hostility to Israel, he said.

The Holocaust "put paid to the fantasy of Jewish power and conspiracy." But Israel's success in the Six Day War in 1967 "liberated anti-Semites from their caution about Jews," he said.

Today, "a red-green alliance" of leftists and Islamic radicals poses a threat to Jews in the West, he said.

As to his second topic, good literature being bad for Jews, Julius said it is based on his work on T.S. Eliot. (His first book was titled T.S. Eliot, Anti-Semitism and Literary Form.) It poses the question of whether great literature can be compatible with ugly racist sentiments.

You can take "the view that a literary work has merit regardless of the views of the writer," Julius said.

York's Holocaust and anti-racism program was launched in 2001 and is directed by professors Michael Brown and Mark Webber. It consists of a month-long field study in Poland and Germany, which was held last summer, followed by the seminar at York.

The program is aimed at future educators from Canada, Poland and Germany who go on to teach and research issues connected to the Holocaust and racism, Brown said.

An open letter:

TO HER EXCELLENCY AMBASSADOR MIRIAM ZIV AND CONSUL-GENERAL AMIR GISSIN

As full and enthusiastic supporters of our beloved Israel, we rabbis of the Greater Toronto Area, are deeply concerned about the threat to Israel that comes from within. The battlefront is the Kotel.

On November 18, 2009 Jerusalem police arrested an Israeli woman, Nofrat Frenkel, at the Kotel. Her crime? Wearing a Tallit and holding a Torah scroll. It is shocking that these two acts seem to be a crime under Israeli law. The battle continues. On January 5 of this year Israeli police called in for questioning another woman, Anat Hoffman, because she wore a Tallit at the Kotel. If this kind of police action had taken place in any other country, the world Jewish community would have accused the state of anti-Semitism and violating basic human rights.

So how can such a travesty be tolerated within the Jewish State itself?

We wish to know what the Government of Israel plans to do to redress the injustices done to Ms. Frankel and Ms. Hoffman. What steps the Government will take to ensure that the Kotel, the centre of Jewish hope and prayer throughout the centuries, will become a place where all Jews will be welcome to worship according to their own tradition? As rabbis and committed Zionists, we cherish the State of Israel as a bastion of democracy and an exemplar of the prophetic values of justice and peace. These values are too precious to lose to religious fanaticism and political manipulation.

USCJ focuses on 'service delivery' to Cdn. shuls

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The transition that will incorporate the Canadian region of United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ), along with three of its nearby U.S. counterparts, into a new entity called the NorthEast district is officially underway, according to an update issued by the umbrella group.

The reorganization is expected to be complete by the end of 2010 and is part of a larger restructuring of the UCSJ that will consolidate 15 regions into six districts. The purpose is to save money and hopefully improve service delivery by sharing resources over a wider geographic area.

But the move comes amid concerns in Canada that the USCJ hasn't been sufficiently attuned to the needs of its Canadian shuls, and after a number of local synagogues broke away from the group in 2008 partly for that reason.

The Canadian region includes 16 congregations from Ontario to the east coast, and will be combined with the old Connecticut Valley, Empire (New York State, western Massachusetts, and southern Vermont) and New England regions. There are some two dozen USCJ-affiliated congregations in Canada in total.

As part of the transition, Albany, N.Y.-based Howard Goldberg, formerly assistant director of the USCJ's Canadian region, became assistant director of NorthEast district on Jan. 18. He's the main contact person for Canadian region congregations. Aaron Kischel, who is based in Boston and served as the New England region's executive director for many years, is the new district director.

As well, Rabbi Jennifer Gorman, who is based in Toronto's USCJ office, has been appointed "consultant," a newly created position to serve the needs of congregations here.

Rabbi Gorman will also continue as director of youth activities. Kadima and United Synagogue Youth will "remain as they are for the foreseeable future," the communique said, referring to the geographic boundaries for the two youth groups.

Paul Kochberg, president of the Canadian region, told The CJN last week that "more and more," the USCJ – the umbrella for some 700 North American congregations – is becoming sensitive to Canadian needs, aside from occasional use of American-focused terminology.

"They sometimes talk in terms of 'national,' as opposed to 'international,' " he said. "We just continue to correct them."

However, he described two recent glitches as being more serious.

On Jan. 13, USCJ members were informed about a Haiti relief fund. An online payment option was available only through a U.S. website – not through the Canadian office with tax receipts available for Canadians, until the omission was pointed out to them.

The previous day, a press release was sent from Goldberg's office urging congregations and congregants to write to Michael Oren, Israel's ambassador to the United States, to express concerns about the issue of women being allowed to pray and wear a tallit at the Kotel. Miriam Ziv, Israel's ambassador to Canada, wasn't mentioned until a later e-mail, after Kochberg brought the faux pas to the USCJ's attention.

Joanne Palmer, USCJ's director of communications, said that Oren had spoken about the issue at the USCJ's biennial convention, and that was the reason people were asked to write to him, although that was not explicitly stated at the time.

Kochberg said that the organization's leaders, including executive vice-president and CEO Rabbi Steven Wernick, who started in those positions last summer, are "mindful of making sure that Canadian synagogues are recognized as being Canadian. They're mindful of the difference and they want to be sure that notwithstanding this merger, the Canadian nature of our Canadian synagogues will not be lost."

The most recent communique from Goldberg's office stated, "During a time when a number of regional offices across North America are being closed… the decision of the USCJ international leadership to retain a USCJ office in Canada, and specifically in Toronto, is a demonstration of the importance that USCJ places on the role of Canadian congregations within USCJ."

Kochberg said that "synagogues here and in the States essentially need the same services – help with fundraising, help with membership development and retention, and leadership development."

Wendy Schneider, co-president of Beth Jacob Synagogue in Hamilton, Ont., agrees.

"We have an ongoing and very positive relationship with USCJ," she said. "I've been very satisfied with the level of service I've gotten."

She cited help with the synagogue's website, which uses the organization's server; two USCJ listservs that she is on; and ongoing support from Goldberg when the synagogue was undergoing staffing changes. "I don't think we could have done it without him," she said.

Schneider is aware that other congregations have had issues over services received in relation to fees paid. Had her synagogue not obtained support from Goldberg, "maybe we would have felt that way, too," she said.

When Toronto's Adath Israel Congregation, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue and Beth Tzedec Congregation left the USCJ in 2008, they cited mainly financial concerns, but also philosophical differences.

Mark Marmer, a board member at Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Thornhill, Ont., doesn't believe philosophical differences are important when it comes to the USCJ, which is primarily focused on delivering services, not mandating theology.

"Synagogues operate autonomously [with respect to implementing a particular religious philosophy], but I think that synagogues need these services," he said.

As co-chair of Shaar Shalom's membership committee, Marmer received assistance from Goldberg both through in-person visits and via Skype. He added that the USCJ has changed its approach: "Instead of just passively waiting for synagogues to call them and say, 'I need this,' they're trying to make one-on-one personal connections with the synagogues."

REENA GETS GRANT

Madeleine Meilleur, Ontario's minister of community and social services, announced last Thursday that the government will be giving $1.5 million to Reena, a Jewish non-profit social service agency that helps integrate adults with developmental disabilities into society. The money will go partly toward the construction of Reena's new building near Rutherford Road and Bathurst Street on the Lebovic Campus. Construction is expected to start this summer. The funding will also help Reena add 56 new spaces to its professional development training program and reduce waiting lists for day and evening youth programs.

Author warns Jews against existential threats

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

As mid-life career changes go, David Solway's has been pretty successful.

An educator and award-winning poet, Solway was spurred to shift gears after 9/11, becoming an author of political books, commentator and public speaker. The terrorist attack on American landmarks affected many people, but for Solway it was like a flashbulb went off in his head, telling him that this momentous event was also a call to action.

Since then, he has been on the parapet, warning his fellow Jews and others who enjoy the benefits of western civilization that the enemy is at the gate; that the 9/11 attacks weren't isolated incidents but part of a broader clash of civilizations; that Jews in particular need to wake up and smell the coffee.

The enemy, whom he has no qualms identifying as militant Islamists, are coming after you, first in Israel and eventually here as well. He believes too many Jews are complacent, too stuck in their ways in supporting liberal political figures intent on appeasing their enemies instead of fighting back.

Needless to say, his attitude will rile many Jews, but his first book, The Big Lie: On Terror, Antisemitism and Identity has been a Canadian bestseller and he's a regular contributor to conservative American blogs and websites. His ideas have clearly struck a chord with many readers.

David Solway

His latest opus, Hear, O Israel! (Mantua Books) may well ruffle the feathers of "the good Jews, who Ezra Levant calls the 'official Jews.'" It is also directed to "righteous Gentiles" – those who recognize the danger and support Israel. "But I'm most concerned with the unrighteous Jews," he said.

Solway places the Jewish people into two broad camps. One consists of "the frightened, timid, cowering Jews who say don't rock the boat when the boat is already riddled with holes and in danger of sinking."

This group believes in working behind the scenes with political figures so as not to draw hostility to Jews.

Another group is the "bland, ineffable, scholarly high falutin' Jews on the model of Shimon Peres in Israel. They are people who express themselves in a global fashion, who see themselves as above the tenets of their own faith or even the need to survive. You have a class of highly intellectual Jews who are not too preoccupied with their own survival [as Jews]."

Nevertheless, Solway said, "being a Jew is like living with a sixth finger. Even if you amputate it, you have a tell-tale stump" and enemies will always recognize you as Jewish.

In titling his book Hear, O Israel! – the opening words of the daily prayer, the Shema – Solway said "I'm using the Shema, but not addressing it to the nation called Israel, but to the people called Israel."

What the Jewish people have to recognize, he continued, is that "to be a Jew is to be at risk."

Anti-Semitism, which many felt had receded, is making a comeback in Europe. "It goes hand in hand with the reigning idiocy, the nanny state, the new socialism," he said.

Leftists, socialists and liberals are placing themselves on the same side of many issues with "what should be Islamic enemies, who are taking over Europe, bit by bit."

"What's being exported to our shores, especially in the United States under [President] Barack Obama is a leftist, socialist almost communistic reform that has made common cause with violent Islam," Solway said.

Already there have been a number of serious attacks by Islamists during Obama's administration – the Fort Hood, Texas, shooting, the Little Rock, Ark., shootings, and the attempt to down a flight from Amsterdam to Detroit.

Even on Canadian campuses, "Jewish kids have to hide behind closed doors or not wear a kippah," he said.

Like his comments in a telephone interview, his arguments in Hear, O Israel! appear relentlessly pessimistic. But Solway believes he's simply describing reality, ugly that it is, and that to meet the challenges ahead, Jews "have to revive the Maccabean strain in our nature, to realize that as safe as we think we are, it is a mirage, an illusion.

"Jews must be vigilant, be aware. You have to be careful and be knowledgeable about what it means to be a Jew.

"There comes a time when you have to be willing to fight. You cannot capitulate or surrender. You have to be brave. You have to be aware."

That means becoming politically astute, lobbying government, supporting Israeli causes, and even making aliyah if it suits you.

If there's a threat against Jews out there, Solway is a virtual lightning rod, drawing it to his own backyard. Since he left his teaching job at John Abbott College in Montreal, his writings have generated plenty of anger. "I made a lot enemies. You should see the hate mail, the death threats."

"I live on the edge. I'm not a comfortable Jew. There's danger," he said.

His wife was so concerned, she suggested they leave their home in western Quebec and move to a Greek island. Instead, he bought a big dog, part wolf, for protection.

Solway said he's not an observant Jew and he's certainly "not a flaccid, insipid half-dead American Jew. I draw my ancestry from the biblical prophets. They are the sages that live inside me.

"I know I am infallibly Jewish even though I seem non-Jewish to some. I don't practise, but I remember," he said.

UJA Toronto's Hope for Haiti Relief Fund surpasses $700,000

IsraAID treating up to 150 patients a day

By Daniel Horowitz

Thanks to the generosity and compassion of Toronto's Jewish community, UJA's Hope for Haiti Disaster Relief Fund has so far raised over $700,000.

The funds are supporting IsraAID: The Forum for International Humanitarian Aid, in its search and rescue efforts on the ground. IsraAID currently has two teams in Haiti.

Funds raised are allocated to United Israel Appeal Canada, for which IsraAID delivers relief services in Haiti. Donations to UJA's Hope for Haiti Disaster Relief Fund are being matched by the Canadian government.

The IsraAID teams currently on the ground have extended their medical and post trauma relief to one of the dire refugee camps that have sprung up in Port-au-Prince since the devastating magnitude 7.0 earthquake pounded the Caribbean nation on January 12th.

The secured camp is located just outside the grounds of the US Ambassador's residence and is now home to 45,000 refugees. The entire area is closed and is secured by the American Navy, and the US Embassy has adopted the camp and is providing humanitarian relief in coordination with a selected number of NGOs. IsraAID has been asked to provide the medical and post-trauma aid to the refugee population in the compound.

IsraAID currently has two teams of search and rescue, and medical professionals on the ground in Haiti.

The IsraAID teams have been working along side the US Ambassador and Israeli actress Moran Atias treating, feeding and offering post-trauma counseling to thousands of people.

The Israeli teams are extremely busy working in the camp as well as running two mobile clinics in satellite camps around Leogone, one of the most devastated areas. IsraAID treats between 100 to 150 patients a day, most of who were severely injured during the earthquake. The teams are also providing community medicine and specifically targeting women. "Medicine is meaningful on any level, community or other," said Dr. Tamar Elram, an IsraAID obstetrics/gynecologist. "It is extremely meaningful to help a pregnant woman by giving her even the most basic support and love."

Since the December, 2004 tsunami in Southeast Asia, UJA has supported IsraAID's search and rescue efforts around the world, wherever human lives are in jeopardy, including the Peru Earthquake, in Darfur, an earthquake in Pakistan, relief aid to Katrina evacuees in New Orleans, aid to Somali camps in Kenya, and to the victims of the recent hurricane in the Philippines.

To donate to UJA's Hope for Haiti Disaster Relief Fund, visit ujadonations.com/haiti, or by calling 416-631-5705. One-hundred percent of the funds raised will be used for the relief effort. Matched dollars will go to Canada's relief fund on behalf of Haiti.

IsraAID medical professionals are treating between 100 to 150 patients a day.

Has Hamas really changed? Can it?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

From time to time, reports appear in the media indicating that Hamas is in the midst of moderating its rejectionist stand against Israel.

For instance, in the Jan. 4 issue of Maclean's, former Mossad chief Efraim Halevy was interviewed by Yoni Goldstein, who asked whether Israel should negotiate with that organization. Halevy answered: "What we need to do is to bring Hamas to a point where it will understand that it is in its interest to reach an accommodation with Israel. And I believe they are on the way."

When Goldstein asked for the evidence to back up his judgment, Halevy replied: "First of all, Hamas' leader, Khaled Meshal, is on the record as saying that he is willing to accept the borders of 1967 as the provisional borders of a Palestinian state. He is not relinquishing the ultimate dream that he will control all of Palestine. But he says that, for the moment, he will accept the 1967 borders. That brings him toward the position where he is accepting the reality of Israel."

In "The Transformation of Hamas" (the Nation, Jan. 25), Fawaz Gerges, a professor of Middle Eastern politics at the London School of Economics, argued the same position at length and in fact commended Halevy for acknowledging Hamas' pragmatic turn.

"Although on the whole, Hamas' public rhetoric calls for the liberation of all of historic Palestine, not only the territories occupied in 1967, a healthy debate has grown both within and without," wrote Gerges, insisting that Hamas is not monolithic and is searching for a path to accommodation with Israel. Indeed, Gerges writes boldly of "Hamas' shift toward the peace process."

If all this lofty rhetoric sounds too good to be true, could that be because it isn't true?

Even Gerges had to raise the obvious skeptical query: "Observers might ask, if Hamas is so eager to accept a two-state solution, why doesn't it simply accept the three conditions for engagement required by the so-called diplomatic Quartet (the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations): recognition of Israel, renunciation of violence and acceptance of all previous agreements (primarily, the Oslo Accords)?"

Gerges' answer is revealing: "In my interviews with Hamas officials, they stress that while they have made significant concessions to the Quartet, it has not lifted the punishing sanctions against Hamas, nor has it pressed Israel to end its siege, which has caused a dire humanitarian crisis. In addition, Hamas leaders believe that recognition of Israel is the last card in their hand and are reluctant to play it before talks even begin. Their diplomatic starting point will be to demand that Israel recognize the national rights of the Palestinians and withdraw from the occupied territories – but it will not be their final position."

Hamas made "significant concessions" to the Quartet? Gerges mentions not one. Israel's "siege" has caused a "dire humanitarian crisis"? In fact, despite Hamas' belligerence and refusal to amend its charter, which calls for the destruction of Israel and the murder of Jews, Israel ships in hundreds of trucks of food and medicine per week to ensure that there is no humanitarian crisis (Israel also accepts thousands of Gazans each year for medical treatment in its hospitals).

But the real key to Hamas' duplicity is Gerges' reference to the organization's insistence that Israel must recognize "the national rights" of the Palestinians – which is code for Israel's accepting the "right of return" of Palestinians to present-day Israel. That is one of the main preconditions for Hamas' (previous) talk of "accepting," however temporarily, Israel within the 1967 borders. In short, Israel would first have to accept its demise as the Jewish state. Halevy doesn't mention this. Gerges leaves it in code. And consumers of news are left in the dark.

Then there's the "moderate" Meshal, who, in fact, is anything but, refusing now even to mention the name "Israel." As reported by Reuters late last month, Meshal told a rally in Damascus, where he's based, that Hamas "will keep rejecting the occupation and refuse to recognize the legitimacy of the Zionist entity. Priority will remain building and developing the resistance."

In short, Hamas remains committed to "liberating" all of Palestine.

Arab nationalists incorporate anti-Semitism, prof says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Arab nationalist discourse on Israel is suffused with anti-Semitism, according to a Canadian Muslim author of a new book on Islam.

"The language of anti-Semitism has been incorporated into the language of Arab nationalism when it comes to Israel," said Salim Mansur, whose book, Islam's Predicament: Perspectives of a Dissident Muslim, was published recently by Mosaic Press.

In an interview, he added, "There is a fusion between anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism."

A Sunni Muslim born and raised in India but a resident of Canada since 1973, Mansur is a professor of political science at the University of Western Ontario and a director of the Center for Islamic Pluralism in Washington, D.C.

Featured in the documentary Obsession: Radical Islam's War Against the West, Mansur was in Toronto last week to promote his book at a forum sponsored by the Speakers Action Group and the Canadian Jewish Civil Rights Association.

Salim Mansur

Mansur, who has been accused by the Canadian Islamic Congress of disseminating "an anti-Arab and anti-Muslim agenda," said the anti-Israel attitude of Arab nationalists is "saturated" with anti-Semitic rhetoric borrowed from Europe and Islamic history.

As he puts it in his book, "Instead of purging themselves of this bigotry and reconciling with Jews and Israel, they have perverted Islam into an anti-Jewish faith."

Describing himself as an observant Muslim from the more liberal Hanafi school of Sunni Islam, he believes that Jewish-Muslim relations have been ruptured by the Arab-Israeli conflict.

"At the heart of Muslim-Jewish animosity is the question of Palestine, and the competing claims of Arabs and Jews to Jerusalem."

By denying Jewish rights to a homeland in Palestine, he says, Arabs have departed from "the path of righteousness" and have gotten mired in "anti-Jewish bigotry."

Asked whether Muslims and Jews can be reconciled, he replied, "Absolutely yes. We have to be persistent. We have to find a way for Muslims and Jews to engage."

Reconciliation, Mansur said, is an imperative for global peace and an end to Muslim terrorism.

He cited two contemporary Muslim leaders who have been open to reconciliation and coexistence – Anwar Sadat, president of Egypt from 1970 to 1981, and Abdurraham Wahid, president of Indonesia, the most populous Muslim state, from 1999 to 2001.

Sadat, in the face of fierce opposition in the Arab world, made peace with Israel after visiting Jerusalem in 1977. Wahid, who had a reputation for religious tolerance and political moderation, headed Nahdlatul Ulama, a Muslim organization with 40 million members, and promoted conciliation with Israel.

Mansur, distinguishing between "official" and "non-official" Islam, suggested that official Islam is represented by Muslim leaders such as Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran, who spews hatred and division, while non-official Islam, typified by Sadat, Wahid and leading Islamic figures in India, is in favour of openness and tolerance.

Claiming that Islam has been politicized, Mansur argues that Muslims can only be politically liberated by subjecting Islam to "unfettered critical inquiry."

Unless this happens, Muslims won't make progress as a people, said Mansur, who calls himself an adversary of "Muslim extremism and fanaticism."

Calling for the reformation of Islam, a process that may take centuries, he said Islam should be personal faith rather than a "politicized ideology."

Taking his argument one step further, he declared, "Islam has been corrupted by politics. There should be a separation of mosque and state in Islam."

Mansur, whose enemies in the Muslim community have branded him an apostate and a non-believer, claims that the principal conflict within Islam today is between tyranny and freedom.

Muslim terrorism, he says is "the ill-begotten offspring of tyranny."

In his view, Muslims should confront and repudiate those who have perverted and hijacked Islam.

"Moderate Muslims are out there, but they have been chased out of the scene," Mansur said.

EXPERIENCED WRITERS WANTED

The Karma Group is seeking a diverse array of writers/screenwriters for immediate development of a script/documentary/book. The subject matter deals with real life events surrounding an alleged ongoing $800 million white-collar corruption scandal rife with constitutional violations and multiple botched cover-up attempts. It allegedly involves certain of the top global accounting firms, as well as several high profile Canadian law firms. The central theme of the work will chronicle the now decade long struggle between Erwin Singh Braich, 53, a prominent international industrialist and philanthropist, and certain parties.

This compelling saga allegedly illuminates bizarre and repeated misconduct by Officers of the Court, trusted civil servants, and others with a fiduciary duty to the general public. These alleged malfeasances include tampering, perjury, brazen abuse of due process, corporate intimidation, and false allegations of criminal activity which led to improperly obtained Warrants for arrest. There are, of course, the all too common threads of double-cross, deceit, theft, and greed.

Our offshore based group is looking for experienced writers to tell this story from a variety of perspectives. Voluminous and impeccable reference material will be provided, including but not limited to official court transcripts, documents, tape recordings, photographs, and sworn statements by witnesses and insiders. This project has a multi million dollar budget and title credits are available. Upon completion this work will be translated for the benefit of foreign distributors.

Grafstein retires from Senate after 25 years

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

If as Shakespeare said through one of his characters, "all the world's a stage," Senator Jerry Grafstein recently completed his "second act," but he's not yet ready to close down the show.

On the contrary, he says, he's actively engaged in his "third act," organizing a bid to take over three flagship Canwest newspapers, the National Post, Ottawa Citizen and Montreal Gazette, with a consortium of bidders. It marks something of a return to his "first act," as a lawyer and entrepreneur involved in the media business.

Few will remember that Grafstein was a co-founder of Citytv or that he joined with Allan Waters in 1954 to buy a struggling radio station that eventually grew into the CHUM empire.

Still, it's his "second act" that he is best known for – almost 26 years representing Toronto in the Red Chamber.

Grafstein, who was appointed by Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, left the Senate accompanied by the accolades of fellow legislators and with the sense that he accomplished much of what he set out to do.

Government leader Marjory LeBreton said "It is difficult to imagine this place or the Liberal party without him," while Opposition leader James Cowan referred to Grafstein as "a force of nature disguised as a person" and like the movie character Zelig, "who just happened to be everywhere anything important was happening, anywhere in the world."

The accolades will keep coming in the spring when Grafstein will be honoured at a tribute dinner by Canadian Friends of Hebrew University. Half the money raised at the event will go to the Centre for Jewish Studies at the University of Toronto, which Grafstein supported by establishing a chair "to expand Jewish studies."

In his farewell address tothe Senate, Grafstein, 75, recalled highlights from his career, among them championing a government apology to Japanese Canadians for their treatment during World War II. His maiden speech touched on that topic and, "contrarian" that he was back then, his position was in direct conflict with that of Trudeau, who never did issue an apology. That fell to Prime Minister Brian Mulroney.

Grafstein recalled he was part of a group of senators who held up an extradition bill the Trudeau government pushed that would have permitted transfers to countries that practise capital punishment. Although it passed, the Supreme Court later "upheld our major arguments," he said.

As chair of the committee on banking trade and commerce, he and other legislators spearheaded a number of important studies on consumer protection, the charitable sector and stemming the flow of illicit money into Canada.

As co-chair of the Canada-U.S. Inter-Parliamentary Group, he advanced Canada's interest on a number of files. And he used his position in the Senate to launch an international career with the 56-member Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE), a body that includes parliamentarians who share concerns over human rights and democratic freedoms.

In his capacity as an officer of the OSCE's parliamentary group, he supported a resolution combating anti-Semitism, which called for member states to draw up strategies and educate the public about the issue. Although the Senate didn't adopt a similar resolution, one of the highlights of his career was "a chilling experience" he had addressing the German Reichstag, where he spoke on anti-Semitism from the same podium Hitler used to announce the Nuremberg laws.

Another of his pet projects, which the OSCE is still discussing, was a Middle East peace plan that focused on creating a free trade zone to bring together countries of the Mediterranean basin, including Israel and its Arab neighbours.

Back in the Senate, he co-sponsored a bill that established Holocaust Memorial Day, and he introduced a bill to add suicide bombing to the Criminal Code, which has passed second reading in the House of Commons.

One of his biggest disappointments was that a bill he proposed to establish a national portrait gallery in Ottawa has failed to advance.

Describing his political philosophy, Grafstein styled himself "a democratic realist. That means you look at issues in a democratic, liberal way, but with realistic glasses. Principles and pragmatism march best when they march together."

Expanding on his philosophy, he said "a liberal democratic realist sees an active role for government and believes government should promote the issues."

"Liberals," he continued, "help those who can't help themselves."

That's also a Jewish approach to public life, he said, pointing to the talmudic principle to treat strangers as you would yourself.

"Jews are born questioners," he said. "I'm a contrarian, you know."

That includes a healthy skepticism of government, he continued. The British tradition of placing checks and balances on the unbridled power of government is one that is manifested in the Canadian Senate, which checks the House of Commons and the cabinet, he said.

Even if the Senate is unelected?

Grafstein's response to that question is that he doesn't oppose an elected Senate per se, but reforming the Senate alone is a "simplistic" step that shouldn't be taken in isolation and must be part of a broader set of constitutional changes.

As for his "third act," getting back into the media game, Grafstein is coy about future developments. But, he said, "I don't accept the conventional wisdom" that the newspaper business is in decline. "I believe there is a future in newspapers."

His contrarian streak stood him in good stead in a couple of projects he's happy to tout.

When Toronto was faced with the SARS crisis in 2003 that crippled the city's hospitality industry, he and Dennis Mills defied conventional wisdom and organized in a short period a Rolling Stones concert that attracted 500,000 fans and demonstrated to the world that Toronto was still open for business.

He was also a big part of the Canada Loves New York campaign, held in the aftermath of 9/11, in which a small group of volunteers organized a trek south of the border of some 30,000 people to show support.

Capping his career was a dinner at which he was "roasted" by former prime ministers Jean Chrétien and John Turner, as well as Liberal leaders Michael Ignatieff and Stéphane Dion.

At the dinner, the speaker of the Senate presented Grafstein with the Canadian flag that flew over Parliament the day he retired. A little while later, he was presented with a second flag, the one that flew over the U.S. Capitol building in recognition of his efforts to draw the two nations closer together.

Both will be prominently displayed at his law offices at Minden Gross.

"I think that's a pretty emotional send-off," he said.

Spice of Life

Chef loves 'playing' with her food

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Robyn Goorevitch's cooking career started when she was tall enough to reach her mother's stove.

"I actually learned to cook at the hands of my mom," said Goorevitch, owner of Dining In Chez Vous, a personal chef service. "I didn't know there were such things as store-bought cookies and candies until I started elementary school."

Goorevitch, who trained at Le Cordon Bleu Ottawa Culinary Arts School, was recently named the personal chef of the year by the United States Personal Chefs Association. She is the first Canadian and second woman to win the title.

For Goorevitch, cooking is about creating. As a personal chef, she's often making new recipes from scratch or personalizing recipes to fit her customers' needs.

"It's a fun process," she said. "Generally, what you do is you start creating the dish, you taste it and say, 'I think it's missing this, what can I put in?'... It's like playing with your food."

Goorevitch first started creating recipes at a seafood restaurant in Edmonton, Alta.

"The desserts were terrible," she said of the restaurant. "I said, 'Even I could do better.'"

And after awhile, the owners took her up on her offer.

"By that time I was working 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. as a legal assistant, three times a week in the restaurant and making desserts," she said, adding that she was in her 20s.

"I said, 'This is crazy. What do I want to do with the rest of my life?'"

Goorevitch's answer lay in the Caribbean. She packed up her life, got on a plane and landed in the Cayman Islands, where she began creating desserts for the only five-star restaurant in Grand Cayman.

"I sold everything that I owned, moved to Grand Cayman, worked at a restaurant and dove during the day. Life was grand," she said.

After spending about eight years in the Caribbean, Goorevitch decided it was time to move on and left the tropics for Canada. Unable to find a job in Toronto, she enrolled in George Brown College and then switched to Cordon Bleu in Ottawa.

Robyn Goorevitch is the first Canadian to win the personal chef of the year award from the United States Personal Chefs Association.

Instead of working at another restaurant after school, Goorevitch decided she was ready to go into business for herself. In 1999, she joined the first Canadian branch of the United States Personal Chefs Association, which has some 130 active Canadian members, and started Dining In Chez Vous.

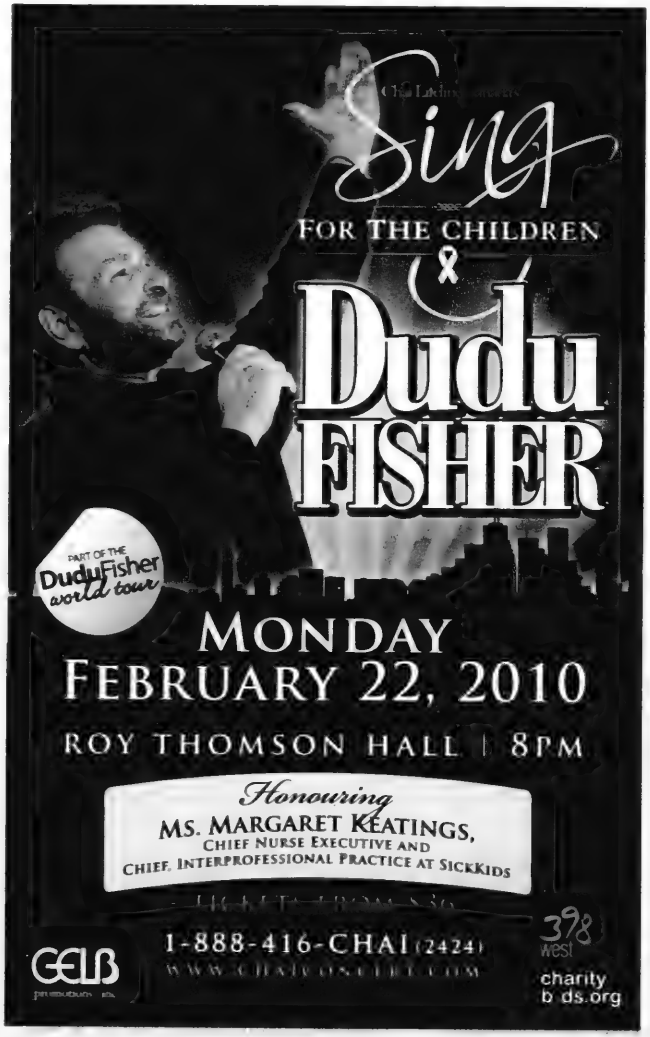
As a personal chef, Goorevitch shops, cooks, serves and cleans up for clients.

"People first said, 'Nobody's going to want a stranger in their home,'" she said.

It took the chef three years to break even, but then business began to boom.

"It's fun to create your own menus. [Customers] say, 'I'm lactose intolerant,' you could create a dairy-free risotto," she said.

Goorevitch has worked in kosher households, where the clients will do the shopping and provide utensils.



Do you have old home movies of family simchas, vacations or community events?

The Ontario Jewish Archives, a department of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, is launching a home movie event this spring and is looking for contributions from community members in the form of historic amateur 8 mm and 16 mm films.

We will be showcasing some of our own treasures, but would like to locate and include additional film clips that compliment the OJA's holdings, in order to try to document the full spectrum of Jewish family and community activities within Toronto.

If accepted, the films will be digitized and incorporated into a professional video presentation that highlights scenes from the Jewish community from the 1920s until the 1960s.

The deadline for suggestions and contributions is 19 February 2010.

Before any donations are made please phone the OJA first, since unsolicited materials will be returned to the sender.

Questions and suggestions should be directed to the OJA at 416-635-2883 ext. 5170 or oja1@ujafed.org.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

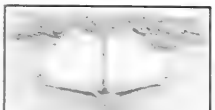
Discrimination seems alive and well

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Not long ago, I wrote about the difficulties and discrimination encountered by Sephardim who wish to enrol their children in Israel's religious private Torah school system.

The premise was as difficult to both comprehend and believe as it was painful. Reminiscent of segregation in the American South, enrolment of Sephardi students in Torah schools was governed by quota, and sometimes it was banned altogether, solely on the basis of their non-Ashkenazi ethnicity.



Rabbinic Reflections

One institution, the girls' Bais Yaakov School of Emanuel, was so blatant in this practice that a complaint was brought before the Ministry of Education. Although a private school and hence fully autonomous, it was receiving its share of government funding. The ministry deferred the question of alleged discrimination to the Israeli Supreme Court of Justice.

This past August, the court ruled. "Bais Yaakov," it said, "impinged upon the Sephardi students' right to equality" by segregating them from their Ashkenazi peers. It also said that the education ministry "deviated from its authority by not using all the means available to prevent discrimination."

Furthermore, the court demanded that the school "remove every formal and material sign of the rampant discrimination."

The school had indeed removed every sign of segregation, including its practice of different uniforms for Sephardi and Ashkenazi girls, different recess times for Sephardi and Ashkenazi girls (which effectively kept the two groups apart) and indeed different school rules, some of which only applied to Sephardi girls, not Ashkenazim, and vice versa.

However, two weeks ago, a motion was again brought before the Supreme Court claiming the school did not in fact heed the court's ruling and hence should be held in contempt of it. The Education Ministry's statement of claim was that inasmuch as the above had been changed, the school nevertheless reserved its right to divide its students into two tracks – chassidic and general.

Since the chassidic tract is made up exclusively of Ashkenazi girls, and the general program is made up mostly of Sephardi girls, the ministry rejected the school's interpretation of the verdict, maintaining that the segregation has simply changed names, from Ashkenazi versus Sephardi to chassidic versus general.

The school was given notice to comply with the court order by Dec. 10.

When a ministerial inspector was dispatched to verify compliance, it was found that 70 of the chassidic girls were absent, making it impossible to determine if the student body in fact had been merged into one.

On a subsequent and unscheduled return visit, the inspector found the 70 girls still missing. Outside the school, the inspector saw groups of girls who would not divulge where they were heading.

It was found that in a nearby hall, owned and administered by the local council, there was a group of students who were studying under what appeared to be a teacher. The Bais Yaakov School denied any connection to the impromptu school.

The ministry is again considering further steps to enforce integration at the school, including withholding funds and cancelling the school's licence. It may further prosecute the parents of the absent students under the law of mandatory education.

Jewish lessons in a Mayan village

If I had lingered in the Cancun airport I'm sure I would have run into at least a dozen students and friends. It was the last day of winter vacation, and an Air Canada flight was departing in a couple of hours. Freshly bronzed vacationers were lined up at security clutching the winter coats they had ignored while sitting on the pristine beaches and sipping mojitos in the opulent hotels of the Mayan Rivera.

Class Act
By Daniel Held

My group, a delegation of rabbinical and education students under the aegis of America Jewish World Service, wasn't heading to the beach, but rather on a journey uncovering the backstage of the Cancun tourist industry, global poverty and international development.

We spent the better part of two weeks embedded in Muchucuxcah, a Mayan village of 400 people located four hours west of Cancun. The people of Muchucuxcah were once humble corn farmers living off the land. The village has a tight-knit social structure. Children play in the streets, smoke from cooking fires billows through the thatching of the huts they call home, and at seven each evening, the bells beckon the locals to church, which serves as a centre of both worship and social gathering. It was the doors of Muchucuxcah that left the greatest impression on me. Of the homes that had doors, none had locks.

Following a week learning about the challenges of life in Muchucuxcah – the absence of potable water, the inaccessibility of medical care, an abysmal education system, and severe malnutrition – our group of budding rabbis and educators travelled to Cancun with six men from the community who had worked in the hotel industry.

With the boom of tourism along the coastal plain beginning in the 70s and 80s, the men of the town began leaving the village to work in Cancun – leaving behind family, community and tradition for periods ranging from two to 20 years.

Seeing Cancun through the eyes of these men, we were exposed to a backstage carefully guarded from the view of foreign tourists. We walked through the slums where scores of workers share the smallest of rooms in crudely built shanties and heard stories of working conditions in which labourers are treated as a commodity rather than humans.

Life in Cancun has exposed the men of Muchucuxcah to violence, drugs, prostitution and disease not found at home. It's blamed for the breakdown of community, ripping apart traditional family structures and for the denigration of the town's deep religious conviction. But the money sent home by working sons and husbands has also brought TV to the village, allowed children to stay in school for longer before working the fields, and has even permitted a few to attend trade colleges.

The tension between economic development and cultural maintenance is best demonstrated by a debate in the local school. The primary language of instruction is Spanish and the school is currently debating if the second language should be Mayan – the language spoken at home, the language of tradition and prayer – or English – the language of economic growth and development. As is so often the case, the pull toward development seems to come at the expense of cultural tradition.

Sending a group of future rabbis and Jewish educators to a Mayan village in the Mexican jungle may seem tangential to the core of our studies. While we certainly accomplish the central aim of engaging young Jewish leaders in discussions about global poverty and debates about allocation of scarce resources, to me, hearing the passion and tenacity with which the villagers struggle with issues of cultural transmission in a globalized world struck a personal chord and reminded me how similar the challenges of our two, seemingly different, communities are.

Jewish Life

From campus friends to business partners

On Campus
By Justin Dahan

For university students, networking is an important tool, and Jewish networking helps many Jewish students across university campuses.

The case of Michael Buchbinder and Arthur Smelyansky is a perfect example of how Jewish networking can succeed.

Both Buchbinder and Smelyansky attended the University of Windsor. They knew each other as members of the Delta Chi Fraternity, but they were unaware that they were both Jewish.

It was at a Windsor Jewish Students Association event that the two met and bonded, and it was there they found out that not only were they both Jewish but that they also shared a similar past and had similar goals. "We found out we both went to Associated Hebrew Schools and the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto together [they are two years apart] and that we lived on the same street pretty much while growing up," Buchbinder said.

"We were surprised to find out we had so much in common. It was our Jewish bond that strengthened our fraternity brotherhood bond. It is this strong connection that helps us work together."

Buchbinder graduated from U of W with a BCom and an MBA after studying finance and economics. Smelyansky graduated with a degree in business and finance. They both went on to work at respected companies, but it didn't take long for them to realize they wanted to start their own company and so SmartTradeFX was born. The company specializes in the foreign exchange market, a.k.a. Forex, the worldwide decentralized over-the-counter trading of currencies.

Both men had a fair amount of experience in the field: Smelyansky had been a forex trader, managing more than half a million dollars when he was just 23 years old, and Buchbinder had been working with Investors Group as a financial planner. But there were a few hurdles in the way of making SmartTradeFX a successful company.

Chabad Gate at Windsor played a part in helping set up the company. A rabbi there helped to put these two young men in touch with many contacts that helped them.

Even with all the contacts gained from Chabad, there was still much work to be done, including drawing up a business plan. Since Smelyansky had experience in the foreign exchange market and understood it, the type of trading the two would do was a simple choice.

"There are many advantages to trading in the forex market versus the traditional stocks, bonds, futures, options or mutual funds. The first is that it is the most affordable to participate in, with some of the lowest entry costs, as you can open an account with as little as $50 and trade micro lots rather than full lots," Buchbinder said.

"Another advantage is the liquidity of the market, with close to $4 trillion a day being traded in the spot retail FX market. This amount eclipses the combined world daily volume of all the stock and bond markets in the world."

Attending a Jewish student association event can become the foundation of a company, as demonstrated by Buchbinder and Smelyansky. It also shows what an important and useful resource Jewish student organizations can be. They are there for everyone to use to their advantage and should not be ignored.

Why Israel really went to Haiti

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

"In less than a week in Haiti, 250 Israeli doctors, nurses and rescue workers not only saved numerous lives of people trapped and wounded – they did more for their country's image than marketing experts have in years," Nathan Guttmann writes at Forward.com. "[bit.ly/isrht01] Selfless act or a public relations stunt? Today, the online debate over why Israel really went to Haiti.

Israeli efforts have been documented by network TV and links have been circulated via e-mail messages.

• CNN: "I've been here since Thursday. No one except the Israeli hospital has taken any of our patients." [bit.ly/isrht02]

• ABC: "Before we knew it, ultrasounds, IVs, medications. Soraya was now getting better care at the Israeli field hospital than she could ever have imagined." [bit.ly/isrht03]

• SKYNEWS: "It's taken eight hours of risky, arduous work for his [Israeli] rescuers and on their faces it shows. So does the gratitude of the Haitians for what they have done." [bit.ly/isrht04]

And the Israel Defence Forces haven't relied on the networks to get their message out. Their English website has more than a dozen Haiti-related articles [bit.ly/isrht19] as well as several videos on their YouTube channel. [bit.ly/isrht06] You can even get instant updates via the IDFinHaiti Twitter feed. ("827 patients treated, 24 hospitalized, 251 surgeries, 14 births at the IDF field hospital in Haiti") [bit.ly/isrht07]

Meanwhile critics abound in online discussion boards. "I guess giving Israel credit for good deeds in Haiti is like watching a serial killer or other sociopathic type mow an old woman's lawn." [bit.ly/isrht09] And it's not hard to find people spouting blood libels that Israelis may be in Haiti looking for a supply of body parts for organ transplants. [bit.ly/isrht08]

Some of the most pointed criticism has appeared in the Israeli press. Writing in Ha'aretz, Akiva Eldar lauds the work of the rescuers and the physicians. But his compliments stop there. "The disaster in Haiti is a natural one; the one in Gaza is the unproud handiwork of man. Our handiwork. The IDF does not send cargo planes stuffed with medicines and medical equipment to Gaza…" [bit.ly/isrht10]

Sever Plocker continues with a similar theme at Ynetnews.com: "The Gaza Strip is ruled by a murderous terror organization, yet dozens of innocent children were killed there during Operation Cast Lead. Without taking anything away from the wonderful dedication and volunteer spirit shown by Israeli teams in Haiti, they should not be surprised to be challenged by the provocative question: Have you been to Gaza already?" [bit.ly/isrht11]

Bradley Burston doesn't buy the criticism as he writes in Ha'aretz. "Israelis, like people in all countries where war is endemic, and like Palestinians, have demonstrated enormous reservoirs of humanity under inhuman stresses… True, it is wilful blindness to contend that Israel can do no wrong. But it is nothing short of racism to maintain, in Haiti and in general, that Israelis can do no right." [bit.ly/isrht12]

With her tongue firmly planted in her cheek, the Telegraph's Stephanie Gutmann takes on critics of the Haiti mission with a column titled, "Israel builds a field hospital in Haiti. Anti-Zionists not fooled!" [bit.ly/isrht13] And Israeli cabinet minister Isaac Herzog explains the efforts but without the irony. "We see this as part of Israel's humanitarian outreach… Haiti was one of the countries that supported us on Nov. 29, 1947, [in the UN vote on the establishment of the state] and now it's our turn to support them." [bit.ly/isrht14]

It should be noted that there are many other Israeli and Jewish organizations helping Haiti, including IsraAid: The Forum for International Humanitarian Aid, the American Jewish World Service, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, Chabad, Magen David Adom [bit.ly/isrht15] and the United Jewish Appeal. [bit.ly/isrht16]

Members of ZAKA are best known for their tireless efforts to retrieve body parts of the victims of terror attacks in Israel. [bit.ly/isrht17] ZAKA's Matti Goldstein explains why his team came to Haiti – and continued to work even on Shabbat. "People asked, 'Why are you here? There are no Jews here.' But we are here because the Torah orders us to save lives… We are desecrating Shabbat with pride." [bit.ly/isrht18]

Spice of Life

You can have your cake and great health too!

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

If you follow a special diet for health reasons such as food sensitivities or allergies or are committed to a healthier diet and lifestyle, there's no need to sacrifice your favourite sweet indulgences. Holistic nutritionist Ricki Heller offers more than 100 original, foolproof, delicious recipes, including her most requested and popular treats, in her excellent book, Sweet Freedom: Desserts You'll Love without Wheat, Eggs, Dairy or Refined Sugar (172 pages, colour photos, metric and standard measurements). This cookbook is a wonderful resource for anyone who loves sweets but wants healthier options. Highly recommended!

Heller used to own a vegan organic bakery, Bake it Healthy. She decided to shift her focus and energy to write Sweet Freedom, which has sold close to 1,500 copies since she self-published it last June. Her recipes are creative and offer a wide variety of baked goods, including muffins, quick breads, scones, cookies, bars, cakes, pies and no-bake treats. About 25 per cent of the recipes are entirely gluten-free, and she uses whole, natural ingredients without any additives, chemicals, colourings, or other artificial ingredients.

When I spoke with Heller recently, she told me, "I just love to play in the kitchen! When I was forced to change my diet for health reasons, I wasn't willing to give up my favourite desserts just because I couldn't use traditional ingredients any longer. I was determined to reproduce all my favourites without sacrificing taste."

All the recipes are kosher and appropriate for those with food sensitivities or allergies (e.g., lactose intolerance, allergy to casein, sensitivity to refined sugar), vegans, or moms who want to make healthy, all-natural desserts for their families. Each recipe is accompanied by a symbol indicating for whom it is most appropriate – SF for soy-free, GF for gluten-free, CF for corn-free, etc. Heller uses whole grain flours (spelt, kamut, barley flour), healthy fats, natural sweeteners such as agave nectar or pure maple syrup, and fresh fruits and veggies. The book also includes an extensive chapter on alternative ingredients, substitutions and healthy replacements for common allergens like milk, eggs, wheat or sugar, which I found extremely well-presented and simple to understand.

For information about ordering Sweet Freedom or Heller's cooking classes, which are offered throughout the Greater Toronto Area, contact her at rheller@rogers.com or call 905-303-7589.

Here's an excerpt adapted from Sweet Freedom that explains how to use agave nectar: "Derived from the juice of the agave cactus, agave nectar has been used for centuries in South America and Mexico and is the basis for tequila. It's 50 per cent sweeter than sugar, yet has a very low glycemic index, so it doesn't cause the same spikes in blood glucose levels that sugar does. It's available in health food stores, some bulk stores and in the natural food section of some supermarkets.

"When substituting agave for sugar, start with 2/3 cup agave for each cup of sugar in the original recipe; if the result is too sweet for your taste, decrease to 1/2 cup next time. Because agave adds more liquid to the original recipe, also reduce any liquid ingredients by about 25 per cent. If the original recipe calls for 1 cup of sugar and 1 cup of milk, use 2/3 cup agave and 3/4 cup milk (the rest of the recipe can stay the same).

"If the original recipe doesn't contain any liquid at all, then add 25 per cent more dry ingredients to the original recipe. If the original recipe calls for 1 cup sugar and 1 cup flour but no other liquid, then use 2/3 cup agave and 1-1/4 cups flour (the rest of the recipe can remain the same)."

CHOCOLATE MYSTERY CUPCAKES

When Heller first started creating alternative baked goods, her zeal to include vegetables in every item led her to this recipe, originally a chocolate lava cake. To her delight, the cakes won a blog contest for favourite vegetable-based recipe! She prefers these as cupcakes with chocolate chips scattered throughout, as it's important to cool the cakes to eliminate any trace of spinach flavour (promise)!

2 oz. fresh or frozen spinach (you may include the stems)
3 1/2 oz. grated zucchini, fresh or frozen (about 1 cup, unpacked)
1/4 cup plain or vanilla soy or almond milk
1/3 cup agave nectar, light or dark
1/8 cup pure maple syrup
1/4 cup sunflower or other light-tasting oil, preferably organic
1 tbsp. finely ground flax seeds
1/2 tsp. apple cider vinegar
2 tsp. pure vanilla extract
2 tsp. instant coffee substitute (or 1 tsp. instant coffee)

Spice of Life

Decadent chocolate

1 cup light spelt flour
1/2 cup whole oat flour
1/3 cup dark cocoa powder (preferably not Dutch process)
1 1/2 tsp. baking powder
3/4 tsp. baking soda
1/4 tsp. fine sea salt
1/2 cup dairy free chocolate chips

Preheat oven to 350. Line 12 muffin cups with paper liners, or spray with nonstick spray (or spray 24 mini-muffin cups)

In a food processor or blender, blend the spinach and zucchini to a paste. Add the soymilk, agave nectar, maple syrup, oil, flax seeds, vinegar, vanilla and coffee substitute and process again until smooth. (There may be a few small flecks of spinach visible; this is fine)

In a large bowl, sift together the spelt flour, oat flour, cocoa, baking powder, baking soda and salt. Pour the wet mixture over the dry and top with the chips. Stir well to combine.

Using a large ice cream scoop or 1/3 cup measuring cup, fill the muffin cups about 3/4 full. Bake in preheated oven 35 to 40 minutes, rotating pan about halfway through, until a tester inserted in a centre cupcake comes out clean. Allow to cool 5 minutes before removing to a cooling rack.

Note: Cool completely before sampling – the flavour changes as they cool, and any trace of veggies disappears in the cold cupcakes. Frost if desired. May be frozen.

DARK AND DECADENT CHOCOLATE PÂTÉ

With heart-healthy flavonoids from the dark chocolate and monounsaturated fats from the avocado, this is a cholesterol-free indulgence that's actually good for you!

scant 1/2 cup packed avocado purée from a barely ripe avocado (about one small avocado)
1 tsp. pure vanilla extract
pinch fine sea salt
9 oz. good-quality dark chocolate (70 per cent cocoa is best, but chocolate chips work, too), chopped (about 1 1/2 cups)
1/4 cup freshly squeezed orange juice (remove any large pieces of pulp)
1 tbsp. pure maple syrup

Line a miniature loaf pan about 6 x 3 inches with plastic wrap and set aside.

In the bowl of a food processor, whir the avocado purée, vanilla and salt. Set aside while you melt the chocolate.

In a heavy-bottomed pot set over the lowest heat possible, combine the chocolate, orange juice and maple syrup. Stir constantly until melted and smooth, about 5 minutes. Immediately scrape the chocolate mixture into the food processor with the avocado, and blend again until perfectly smooth and glossy. Turn the mixture into the loaf pan and smooth the top.

Refrigerate, uncovered, until the top is firm and dry; then cover the top with more plastic wrap and refrigerate until the entire loaf is firm, 4 to 6 hours or overnight.

To unmould, remove plastic from the top of the loaf. Invert over a serving dish and remove the loaf pan, then carefully peel away the plastic. Serve in thin slices with fresh berries. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

May be frozen; defrost, wrapped in plastic, in the refrigerator overnight.

Coast to Coast

New federation head focused on identity

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Ben Cohen, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's new president, says he'll be focusing on initiatives to strengthen Jewish identity within the community over the two years of his term.

"We have built the physical plant with our [Asper Jewish Community] Campus," he said. "Then we concentrated on increasing the size of our community through fostering immigration from South American countries, as well as encouraging former Winnipeggers to come back to the community. Now, we want to address some of the recommendations put forward last year by our strategic planning committee toward raising the temperature of Jewish life."

Cohen, a graduate of McGill University and the London School of Economics, is taking on his new role at a particularly busy time in his life. The married father of three elementary school-aged children – they attend the Gray Academy of Jewish Education – is also completing an executive MBA at Harvard University (in March) and is expanding his businesses.

For the past 16 years, Cohen has been the Oreck Vacuum distributor for Canada. About a year ago, he acquired the rights to distribute the product internationally.

"We are now operating in Australia and New Zealand, Turkey, Romania, Holland and Mexico," he said.

He is also in his fifth year as the Canadian distributor for Israeli-based Amcor Ltd.'s portable furnaces and air conditioners. "Amcor's air conditioners are the most powerful portable units on the market," Cohen said.

He said that in September, he became the Israeli company's distributor for the United States, as well as Canada.

Prior to joining the federation's board in 2005, Cohen had been active (and still is) in the Herzlia Adas-Yeshurun Synagogue, helping the Orthodox shul raise funds, and he had been involved in the annual Combined Jewish Appeal campaign.

On the federation board, he served as chair of financial resource development and as CJA campaign chair. He had been vice-president for the past two years.

Cohen said that this year's CJA campaign has turned out very well. "We are very close to our final target of $5.5 million," he said. "We have exceeded last year's totals, despite still being in an economic downturn when we started the campaign in September."

On the topic of Jewish immigration to Winnipeg, Cohen noted that there are still some South American and Israeli families coming to Winnipeg.

"Immigration ebbs and flows, depending on conditions in their home countries," he said of the South American immigrants who came in large numbers to Winnipeg at the beginning of the decade.

As a Winnipeg Jewish businessman, Cohen has done his share to give the new immigrants a helping hand over the past 10 years, noting that over the past decade, he has always had at least one Jewish South American newcomer working for him.

"I currently have four former South Americans working for me now, including my vice-president of sales," he said. "We are sponsoring him to attend a program at Harvard for key executives."

Artist donates leaders' portraits to Israel

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER —She's been an artist for 50 years, but it wasn't until the 1990s that Joy Caros began painting the portraits of Israeli presidents and prime ministers.

Last month she donated them to the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University (CFHU), and the portraits, which arrived in Israel a couple of weeks ago, will soon be on permanent display in the Knesset.

Caros couldn't be happier.

"This is the ultimate honour for me," she said in an interview in Vancouver. "All the dignitaries that visit Israel will see the portraits of the men who made Israel, and that's important. Israel needs to have its prime ministers up there on the government walls, signifying that this is a valid country. That's what this collection stands for."

Although they're both Christians, Caros and her husband, James Rawlings, are strong supporters of Israel.

"We believe God gave that land to the Jewish people, and it should stay that way," Rawlings said.

Caros agreed. "I think [Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu is awesome, and I'm anxious to meet him," she said.

"I think he's the best thing that happened to Israel, and he'll fight for the land."

Caros may have an opportunity to meet Netanyahu when she travels to Israel in May and is honoured at an event to be held by CFHU.

To date, she has painted 18 portraits of Israeli leaders and still has another three to go. Each one takes approximately one month to complete and the portraits have been independently valued at $9,500 each by the Petley-Jones Gallery in Vancouver.

The portraits were created as a gift for Israel, and the majority of them were completed between 1998 and 2000, Caros said.

"I felt this was something I could do for Israel, because they didn't have portraits of their prime ministers and presidents like most countries do," she explained. "My husband and I are Zionists and we love Israel, so I thought, 'Let me do this as a gift to the country.'"

Jews have helped her throughout her career, Caros added.

Stanley Kramer commissioned her to paint the characters of the film It's a Mad, Mad World in the 1960s, and in Vancouver, she has worked closely with Joseph Cohen of Sony, as well as families such as the Segals, Wosks, Adlers and Malicks.

She's also done portraiture for Hollywood stars such as Spencer Tracy, Jonathan Winters and Sammy Davis Jr., and is presently doing a series on the chefs of Vancouver.

Born in Trail, B.C., and a mother to seven children, Caros started out sketching pastel portraits of Vancouver diners.

Her work has taken her all over the world, and she has lived in California, the Caribbean, Italy, Switzerland, Holland, France and Israel, but she returned to Vancouver to be closer to her 18 grandchildren.

Still, this octogenarian is eager to continue making her art and plans to paint and travel in the years to come.

"Nowadays, more and more people want portraits, because an artist can breathe life into a portrait and make the subject more alive than photography can," she said.

"I've met some wonderful people all over the world doing this," she added. "The Bible says your talent will put you before kings, and that is what's happened."

Students see results of fundraising for Israel first-hand

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

When Hillie Sturm visited Israel last month, he didn't have much time to relax.

In his week off from school, the Toronto native, along with 11 other Yeshiva University undergraduate students, painted an apartment building, worked on an elementary school's garden and helped start the process of resettling families from the Gaza Strip.

The YU students were part of the school's Quality Education Skills Training (QUEST) program, which helps build leadership skills through lectures and first-hand experiences.

For the first time, QUEST partnered with the Jewish National Fund (JNF) to raise money for a Jewish cause of the students' choice.

The students decided to support the Halutza project, which aims to resettle Jews who were evacuated from Gaza in 2005, when Israel withdrew from the area. Families will be resettled into the desert community of Halutza.

After a semester of fundraising, Sturm and his peers raised about $22,000, which will go toward building permanent homes, schools and community centres in the area.

For Sturm, the project hit a chord, since his cousins were affected by the evacuation.

"They lost everything, they had no one to help them out. When this opportunity came up, that's who I thought of," he said. "This money that was raised will help these people. That's what gave me this motivation."

QUEST participants raised funds through a comedy night, a website and a phone-a-thon.

"At the beginning, it seemed a little daunting. It seemed a lot to us," Sturm said, adding that the original goal was $20,000.

"Once we saw that maybe it was tangible, it inspired us to push harder."

When the students reached their goal, JNF, along with QUEST, sent them to Israel on the week of Jan. 4 to see where their money would go.

Rabbi Kenneth Brander, dean of Yeshiva University's Centre for the Jewish Future, sees QUEST as an important experience.

"It's almost like a Habitat for Humanity-type program… These students realize how they can, in a challenging economy, raise $22,000 and use those funds to help build some infrastructure," he said. "And they, themselves, can be involved in the work effort."

Hillie Sturm, right, and fellow Yeshiva University student Sammy Steiner sample vegetables while working in a garden in Israel.

For Rabbi Brander, the fact that students were able to interact with community members was essential to the program.

"For these students to see how the funds were used and to be involved… it doesn't just inform them, it allows them to understand the process," he said.

For Reuven Turgel, a participant and Montreal native, the trip helped him feel closer to QUEST's cause.

"We wanted to take part in building something from new and really make something from nothing," he said, adding that his group visited the area where the community will be built.

"It's pretty empty. They're going to start building really soon, I'd love to come back and see how our money really helped," he said.

One of Turgel's most memorable moments in Israel was visiting a kindergarten class.

"We planted a garden with the kids… we saw green in the desert. You had to actually see it to believe it," he said. "You have sand and a big patch of green in the middle. We picked carrots from the middle of the desert."

Turgel was impressed by the garden, and not just because of its carrots.

"One of the things [their teachers] valued was to teach the children how to do agriculture from a really young age," he said. "They see the importance of building the land for the future of Israel."

Along with the QUEST program, Yeshiva University also ran two winter break programs in Israel. The first, called Operation Healthcare, which ran from Jan. 4 to 15, focused on Israel and America's health-care system. Pre-med students from YU worked in hospitals, visited soup kitchens and learned about social responsibility in the medical field.

The second Israel trip, from Jan. 6 to 17, was called Shabbat 2010 and taught students the significance and roots of Shabbat observance.

Pop rockers aim for music that gets 'stuck in your head'

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Joseph Shabason always thought he'd become a jazz musician. Then he formed a pop-rock band.

Shabason, 27, has played jazz since he was 10 years old. He graduated from the University of Toronto's jazz performance program, but after a year, he started to have doubts.

"I realized, maybe I didn't like jazz anymore. Instead of giving up at jazz altogether, I thought it would be a good idea to try my hand at writing rock music."

This is how Everything All The Time was born. The band, which was started by Shabason and his friend, Kieran Adams, about two years ago, plays mainly upbeat indie rock with a splash of pop. For Shabason, the switch from jazz to rock wasn't an easy one.

"It was tough. I think, at first, I was really kind of scared... to be out of my element," he said. "After a while, it sort of felt completely natural. It felt the most natural that any type of music ever had."

From playing in various punk and rock bands while in high school, he learned the power of catchy lyrics.

"Jazz is a sort of intellectual pursuit," he said. "[In rock] you can write songs that people can sing along to. Seeing people singing your songs is a pretty amazing thing."

Everything All The Time is a unique rock band.

When on stage, the members may be hammering on keyboards, but it's hard to find a guitar. The band mostly uses synthesizers– at least seven or eight per show.

Everything All The Time is made up of vocalist Alanna Stuart; Adams, who plays drums; Jeremy Little who plays bass and bass synthesizer; Dafydd Hughes; Robbie Grunwald; Mary Cobham and Shabason, who plays the keyboard and sings backup vocals.

Band members use laptops as well as synthesizers that date back to the 1970s and '80s. They find their synthesizers on Craigslist or in stores that sell used musical instruments.

"It's all synthesizers... They're quite a spectacle... We're doing that in lieu of having guitar and bass and stuff. It's sort of a different sound," Shabason said, adding that the band's use of synthesizers came more out of need than choice.

"It started because of my limitations as a musician. I played sax and was trying to write songs for a rock band. All I had were synthesizers and keyboards. From there, we all took it and ran," he said.

Most of the band's songs start from a piano chord.

"Because it's all synthesizers, we'll write songs based on a sound. Once we have a general progression, we'll put it into the computer," Shabason said, adding that he usually writes songs with Adams. After the initial chords are chosen, Shabason will write a demo and the band will discuss it.

"It really takes shape from there," he said.

While most of their songs start from a chord, their lyrics usually start from one line.

"What ends up happening is maybe a line will get stuck in your head, and from that one line, I'll build that song around that," Shabason said.

This is how The Only One You Love Is You, a song about a narcissistic friend, was born.

"Some of our best songs come from personal experiences," he said. "What we're trying to do is write pop music that people can sing along to and dance to and it gets stuck in your head."

Most of the band members also play in other groups. Shabason and Grunwald played in Bass Groove, a band that often performed in the Jewish community.

For Little, 32, who's involved in three bands, Everything All The Time is about having fun.

"A lot of the people in this band are a lot of side people for other bands... we just wanted to do... something that was our own," he said. "This is something we got interested in doing for fun, and it's just kind of gone from there."

Grunwald, 31, agrees. His favourite part of playing in the band is watching the audience's reactions.

"The reactions we get are just so strong... When you're on stage, you look up into the crowd and people are just dancing, they're really into the music. It's a great experience," he said.

While the group is gaining in popularity, being a Toronto band is an uphill battle, Grunwald said.

"It's really tough, especially in Toronto, because there are so many bands," he said. "It takes a lot of persistence, a lot of luck, a lot of strategy."

For Shabason, the main challenge is apathetic crowds.

"People don't necessarily go out to see music unless there's a seal of approval on it, and that's a tough thing," he said, adding that the band is about to tour Ontario and Quebec. "Ultimately, if you write good music and people are into it, they're going to like you."

Free speech 'essential', educators say

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Universities should protect a student's right to free speech, even if their opinions are a veil for anti-Semitism, said Jack Lightstone, president and vice-chancellor of Brock University.

Lightstone was one of eight speakers to testify at a Jan. 25 hearing held by the Canadian Parliamentary Coalition for Combating Anti-Semitism (CPCCA). The CPCCA hearings, which began on Nov. 2, are being held to discuss the issue of anti-Semitism in Canada.

Speakers at last week's session included Lightstone; Patrick Case, director of the human rights and equity office at the University of Guelph; Morton Mendelson, deputy provost of student life and learning at McGill University; Bonnie Patterson, president and CEO of the Council of Ontario Universities; Gerald Gerbrandt, president of the Canadian Mennonite University; Michel Lamontagne, special adviser for institutional relations at the Université de Montréal; Marilou McPhedran, principal of Global College at the University of Winnipeg, and Stephen Owen, vice-president of external, legal and community relations at the University of British Columbia.

According to Lightstone, some students on campus may be finding an outlet for their anti-Semitism by criticizing the Israeli government.

"There is one garment in which Jew-haters can cloak themselves, and that is criticism of Israeli politics," he said. "But outing anti-Semites by banning the cloak may be a cure that's worse than the disease."

Lightstone went on to say that free speech must be protected in Canadian universities, as long as students are not engaged in hate speech.

"It does not matter whether criticism makes those who support the contrary views uncomfortable. Even the expression of distasteful and stupid ideas must be tolerated so that they may be confronted by their critics," he said.

Mendelson of McGill agreed, and during his testimony, he read an opinion piece he wrote that ran in the McGill Tribune, a student newspaper.

"The freedom to express a wide range of ideas... is essential in a modern universi-ty," he read. "Our tolerance may be tested, but as long as the audience is present by choice and not by accidental requirement, even objectionable speech ought to have its place."

Owen of UBC stressed the importance of open dialogue between Muslim and Jewish campus groups. He used last March's Israeli Apartheid Week as an example, stating that, during this time, the university's administration met with both groups to encourage a conversation between Jewish and Muslim students.

Owen added that there must be a balance when dealing with freedom of speech.

"Unlimited free speech can be anarchic. If... it's so free that we bear no responsibility... then that's going too far," he said. "But as well, if we're so secure that nobody can say anything to insult us, to offend us, then we're just frozen, we're in prison. So finding that balance is a challenge."

The final CPCCA hearing will take place on Feb. 8.

מה יהיה

באופן כללי אנחנו חשופים ליותר ויותר אלימות- אם דרך המדיה ואם דרך קשרים אישיים או עקיפים עם אנשים שנחשפו לאלימות. סיג האלימות שאי אפשר, יאסור לעבור עליה לסדר היום היא אלימות כלפי ילדים. וגם בתחום הזה- המקום הנמוך ביותר היא אלימות מינית כלפי ילדים. בהקשר זה, נדמה לי שנשבר לאחרונה בישראל שיא הזוועה:

ילד מישוש בדרום הורחק מביתו בעקבות תקיפה מינית על ידי אימו, שהודתה באשמת זימות יחסי מין עם בנה וניידונה לגאסר ממושך. מאחר ואביו לא היה מוכן לקחת אותו תחת חכותי- הוא נמסר לאימוץ למשפחה במרכז הארץ. כעת מסתבר שאבוי המאמץ של הילד, כמו גם מדריכו בפנימיה שבה הוא לומד, אנסו אותו במשך תקופה ארוכה.

נשיא ישראל והחליפה

תודה לחותי על הסיפור הבא:

כשהיה הנשיא פרס בקזחסטן, הוא קנה בד יקר וביקש מחייט מקומי שיתפור לו חליפה. בדק החייט את הבד ואמר לו: "כבוד הנשיא, הבד הזה יספיק אולי למכנסיים". משם המריא פרס ללונדון והראה את הבד לחייט ברישי. עמה לו החייט "סחי, כבוד הנשיא, זה יספיק בקושי לשרוול".

חזר פרס ארצה והראה את הבד לחייט שלו ברחוב ליליובלום. "מה אתה יכול לעשות עם הבד הזה?" בדק החייט את הבד ואמר לו:" שתי חליפות ועוד זוג מכנסיים". התפלא פרס: "איך זה שבחו"ל זה לא הספיק לכולם וכאן אתה תופר לי חצי מלתחה?".

חייך החייט: "אדוני הנשיא, בחו"ל אתה ענק ופה...."

על מצב החילה

בישראל מן הידועות היא כמה קשה לקבל מידע על מצבך הרפואי בזמן אשפוז, בעקר אם אתה זקן ונטול קשרים

("פרונקציה"בעברית). אז הינה סיפור מאלף שהגיע לשולחני מפיו של חבר נוה שנמהל מחלקה במרכז הארץ: אשה מתקשרת לבית חולים מקומי ומבקשת מידע על בת משפחתה החולה. שואלים אותה"מה השם, המחלקה ומספר החדר?" ענה האשה:"שרה פינקל, חדר 302".

"אעביר אותך לעמדת האחיות ג'" ענה המרכזנית.

"עמדת אחיות ג', איך אני יכולה לעזור לך?"

" אני רוצה לדעת את מצבה של שרה פינקל מחדר 302".

" רק רגע, תני לי להסתכל בגליון שלה...אה, כן, מצבה טוב מאוד, כל הבדיקות תקינות והולכים להוריד לה את המנדינזור של הלב, רדוקטור כהן מתכוון לשלוח אותה הביתה מחר".

אומרת האשה: "תודה לאל, כל כך הוקל לי!"

ענה לה האחות: "אני מבינה שאת בת משפחה או חברה קרובה".

"לא בדיוק, אומרת האשה, אני שרה פינקל מחדר 302, משום אף אחד לא אומר לי כאן כלום!"

Israel has made a good case against Goldstone

By AMOS HAREL
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

ANALYSIS

Israel's detailed response to the Goldstone report shows that the country can, in fact, respond to accusations with more than complaints of anti-Semitism and endless repetitions of the mantra that "the Israel Defence Forces is the most moral army in the world."

Drawn up by the Foreign Ministry, the Justice Ministry and the IDF prosecutor's office, the document gives a wide-ranging and well-argued reply to many of the claims raised by Goldstone.

It also contains some interesting details that were never, for some reason, disclosed to the Israeli media and public about Operation Cast Lead, which took place in Gaza from Dec. 27, 2008, through Jan. 18, 2009.

The most remarkable details concern the one-time disciplinary measures that were taken against senior Israeli commanders in the operation. Following what he saw as unjustified artillery fire at a Hamas compound in the Gaza City neighbourhood of Tel al-Hawa, Cmdr. Yoav Gallant decided to officially reprimand two officers: a brigadier-general and a colonel.

Their names and the details of the reprimand are not specifically mentioned in the report.

The Golani brigade was known to be operating in the area where the shooting took place.

Another revelation is the fact that in November, the chief of staff set up a new General Staff investigative team to investigate one incident in which a mosque was destroyed and another in which many civilians were killed, and also to look into a number of complaints about inappropriate treatment of Palestinian prisoners.

Israel's detailed and well-argued report shows that the country has a reasonably good case against the Goldstone accusations. This naturally begs the question of why Israeli leadership is so wary of a state commission of inquiry that could ostensibly clear up matters once and for all.

Any such obligation is missing from the report, as arguments in Israel continue on whether to set up an examination committee or a state commission of inquiry. As of now, it seems an examination committee will be set up, but its powers are yet to be defined. Prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu preferred to postpone the decision – hoping that either a consensus will be reached, or that the international pressure on Israel will ease, making the committee unnecessary.

Judge hit by shoe

An Israeli man threw his shoes at Israel's Supreme Court president, hitting her in the face. The force of the impact caused Dorit Beinish to fall from her chair during the attack last Wednesday. She was removed from the courtroom and received medical attention. Beinish returned to the courtroom shortly after the incident. The court had been in the middle of a hearing on medical marijuana. The attack was unrelated to the hearing. The attacker, who was arrested immediately following the incident, shouted "traitor" and "you destroyed my life," as well as "you're corrupt," during the attack, according to reports. President Shimon Peres took time away from his duties while on a state visit to Berlin to call Beinish to ask about her health.

Israel joins UN bloc

Israel was granted membership in a United Nations regional group in Geneva. Israel's membership in JUSCANZ – an acronym for Japan, the United States, Canada, Australia and New Zealand – was approved last week by consensus. The group also includes Norway, Switzerland and several other democratic countries. The move was hailed by both the American Jewish Committee and its Geneva affiliate, UN Watch, which called it a "historic accomplishment." Israel has long been prevented from joining regional groups at the United Nations, a state of affairs that has inhibited its full participation in the world body and roused the ire of its Foreign Ministry and American Jewish groups, which considered the exclusion a blatant contravention of the UN charter's guarantee of state equality. In 2000, Israel was admitted to the western European and Others Group, or WEOG, at UN headquarters in New York.

Limits on illegal migrant workers

Israel's cabinet approved draft legislation that would limit the number of illegal migrant workers entering the country. The move would open up 30,000 to 50,000 jobs for Israelis within a year, Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz said. "The massive entry of migrant workers into Israel in recent years has created problems with security, drugs and, mainly, in the job market, decreased wages," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said during the cabinet meeting. "The migrant workers are a weight that push salaries lower. We are talking about damage to our society and an additional aspect of Israel as a Jewish state." The plan would impose heavy fines on those who employ illegal foreign workers and change taxation benefits for the employers. In December, there were about 255,000 foreign workers in Israel, 125,000 of them in the country illegally, comprising more than 10 per cent of the work force. – JTA

Problem will not go away

But it has been the modern Orthodox movement, the observant Zionist Jews, who have ceded ground to the haredim and have allowed themselves to be intimidated into accepting haredi demands, he said.

The haredim have assumed a virtual monopoly over conversions, "and it's been done, interestingly enough, because of the weakness of modern Orthodoxy or Zionist religious movement, which has been concentrating for years on the borders of the Land of Israel. The Zionist Orthodox concentrate on the borders, while the haredi Orthodox concentrate on what's going on inside the borders," he said.

"I think Israel has come out of this weakened considerably. It is a catastrophe for halachic Judaism and Zionism."

Traditionally, conversions have been performed by local rabbis, and under Jewish Law, these were recognized in the wider Orthodox world. However, with the growth in political clout of the haredi establishment, Israel's chief rabbinate announced in 2006 that it would not accept international Orthodox conversions unless they conformed to haredi standards. Israel does not recognize Reform or Conservative conversions. (Within the Jewish state, personal status issues such as marriage, divorce and burial are governed by each community's religious authorities.)

The influx of one million Soviet immigrants, including many who aren't halachically Jewish, caused further strains. Sensitive to the issue, former prime minister Ariel Sharon called on Rabbi Chaim Druckman, head of a hesder yeshiva, to operate the National Conversion Authority, Orthodox rabbinic courts that would be in charge of converting those who wished to join the Jewish fold. However, even these conversions have been rejected by haredi rabbis, while recent decisions by haredi rabbinic courts have called into question the validity of conversions by non-haredi Orthodox rabbis in a number of Israeli cities.

Conversions by Orthodox rabbinic courts (bet dins) in the Diaspora have also been rejected by Israeli religious authorities. In one notorious case involving Yossi Fackenheim, the son of renowned philosopher Emil Fackenheim, a childhood conversion by the Orthodox Toronto beit din was annulled when the judge decided he did not subsequently live an observant lifestyle.

About four years ago, the Rabbinic Council of American (RCA), which represents 1,000 Orthodox rabbis, agreed to tighten the criteria for conversions to limit them to Torah-observant Jews and restrict conversions to those performed by rabbis deemed acceptable to Israel's chief rabbinate.

In Canada, a number of prominent rabbis have announced they will no longer perform conversions.

The repercussions of these developments in Israel have been substantial, Rabbi Melchior said. "This is a big national issue. In this period, the people who came here were very much interested in coming to Israel and were interested in converting. If they had been received with open arms, they would have wanted it. Now, the majority don't even want it."

It's a problem that's not going to go away, he continued. In recent years, more than 90,000 children have been born who study in Israel and serve in the Israel Defence Forces, yet they are not accepted as legitimate Jews. For them, too, the current situation is a "catastrophe," Rabbi Melchior said.

Rabbi Melchior, who has launched Moe'tzet Yachad, a forum that promotes dialogue and understanding between different strands in Israeli society, sharply criticized haredi rabbinic judges, who have annulled conversions by non-haredi Orthodox rabbinic courts.

Haredim, he said, "have the right to make their own halachic interpretations, but I think in some interpretations, they go strongly against Halachah when it comes to annulling the conversions that happened in the past. There is no basis whatsoever in the tradition of Halachah. There is no precedent in Halachah," he said.

"The problem is that the main rabbinic institutions in the country and also abroad in North America, with the agreement of the Rabbinical Council of America and in Europe, everyone has given in to the haredi interpretation. But the haredi interpretation never takes into account klal Yisrael [the broader Jewish community]. They're not part of the Zionist movement.

"The main blame is on the mainstream Zionist parties in Israel."

Rabbi Melchior said all the major Israeli parties – Likud, Labor, Kadima – give in to the haredim to secure their political support. "They've sold out on Zionism," he said.

Asked why so many Orthodox rabbis and bet dins accept haredi dictates, Rabbi Melchior said, "They are afraid. They feel the Zionist rabbinate in Israel has not given them any backing."

Rabbi Melchior, who said he has personally felt the sting of haredi criticism, said, "I'm used to it. I do according to my conscience… I'm also in a difficult situation, being inside the Orthodox establishment and on several issues not following the party line."

He pointed to a recent case involving Rabbi Chaim Amsalem, a member of the haredi Shas party who advanced a plan to ease the conversion to Judaism of descendants of Jews who immigrated to Israel and served in the armed forces. Even though his proposal was based on the halachic principle of "zera Yisrael [seed of Israel]," he "experienced a smearing campaign," Rabbi Melchior said.

That sort of intimidation is silencing many Orthodox rabbis, he added.

But the issue is too important to ignore, he continued. "If we close down the door toward even halachic conversions, we're saying to a big part of the Jewish world, 'You're not wanted in the Jewish community, you're not part of the Jewish world.'"

Despite his personal commitment to liberalizing the conversion process, Rabbi Melchior isn't particularly optimistic about the future. "The haredi political influence is only growing, and it will grow until the day the Zionist parties will understand they are digging the grave of the future of the Jewish People by giving in to this kind of extortion.

"It will go on as long as the [political] leaders will not be leaders and give in on everything to achieve political power," he said.

IDF team returns home from Haiti

JTA

JERUSALEM — The 200-member Israeli military medical and rescue team was honoured upon its return to Israel from Haiti last week.

The team had been among the first aid workers to arrive in the country following the devastating earthquake that hit there on Jan. 12.

"You raised peoples' spirits; you raised the name of the State of Israel and the name of the [Israel Defence Forces]. Precisely during these days, during which there are those who conspire against us and distort and degrade the name of the IDF and the name of the State of Israel, you showed the world the true spirit of the IDF," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Thursday morning during an official military ceremony at Ben-Gurion Airport.

The ceremony was attended by senior officials of both the IDF and the government.

"You have merited praise from all over the world and have turned into a source of pride for every Jew and every Israeli," said Chief of the General Staff Lt.-Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi. "Lately there have been those who complain about the IDF and have chosen to muddy its face and complain against its morals and ethics. In your work, you have proven the opposite to be true – our values guide us to cross continents in order to save lives. That is what guides us today and will continue to guide us in the future."

"As commander of this army, I was excited to represent you," Ashkenazi said.

The IDF made the decision to pull out after the arrival of more aid forces to Haiti, as well as U.S. military, and civilian aid organizations.

Several Haitian hospitals are also operating in some capacity, the army said.

The team left more than 30 tons of medical equipment and supplies in Haiti to help further earthquake relief efforts, according to the IDF, including bandaging gear, surgery equipment, two incubators and other medical accessories, as well as 1,150 blankets, 30 large-sized tents, 500 mattresses, 200 sleeping bags and kitchen equipment. The equipment will be distributed to tent cities throughout Haiti, co-ordinated by the Israeli ambassador in the country.

During its stay in Haiti, the delegation treated more than 1,100 patients, conducted 319 successful surgeries, delivered 16 babies, including three caesarean sections, and saved many from the ruins of the devastating earthquake.

The team also brought a five-year-old Haitian child to have heart surgery in Israel, according to the IDF.

Coalition holding Netanyahu back

By RON KAMPEAS

JTA

TAMPA, Fla. — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is being held back by his coalition in trying to make peace moves, U.S. President Barack Obama said at a town hall meeting.

Obama, speaking in Tampa Jan. 28, was asked why his administration continues to support Israel and Egypt despite their "human rights violations against the occupied Palestinian people."

Obama started his answer by describing Israel as "one of our strongest allies" and a "vibrant democracy," adding that "we will never waver from ensuring Israel's security and helping them secure themselves in what is a very hostile region."

However, he said attention must be paid to "the plight of the Palestinians" and "Israel has to acknowledge legitimate grievances and interests of the Palestinians." He said the politics are difficult for both Israel and the Palestinians.

"The Israel government came in based on the support of a lot of folks who don't want to make a lot of concessions," Obama said. "I think Prime Minister Netanyahu is actually making some effort to try to move a little bit further than his coalition wants him to go."

While Netanyahu's government has acceded to some internal pressure to add housing in parts of the West Bank and eastern Jerusalem, he has frozen building in other areas.

The Palestinian Authority does not want to return to talks without a total freeze on building in the settlements.

Obama also said that Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas "genuinely wants peace, has to deal with Hamas, an organization that has not recognized Israel and has not disavowed violence."

Canadian olim 'Stand Together' with Israel's soldiers

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Standing Together hands out treats – pizza, popcorn, clothes, toiletries, you name it – to Israeli soldiers on active duty.

Canadian Howard Osterer found out about the organization shortly after immigrating to Israel in December 2008, and despite the busy life of the new immigrant, he decided there was no way he couldn't volunteer.

"These kids are putting their lives on the line so that we can sleep at night. These kids are my heroes," says Osterer, originally from Ottawa, where he volunteered and worked for Scouts Canada for 25 years.

"I believe you are here and you have to put something back into the country. To give these kids a smile, to make their lives just a little bit better, this is my way of putting a little bit back."

Osterer, 55, heard about the organization from fellow Canadian immigrant volunteer Barbara Sternberg, 54, who made aliyah in 1967 and found out about Standing Together last summer. With two of her four children having completed their Israel Defence Forces service, she had a personal reason to get involved.

"When you have kids in the army, you have a sensitive spot for soldiers. These soldiers give their lives for us, and this is one way to do something special for them," says Sternberg, who is heading a new campaign for Standing Together, recruiting women from Canada, United States and Australia to knit and crochet scarves for soldiers.

"Jews all over the world are so appreciative of the soldiers' service, and they want to do something to say thanks. It's a real labour of love to knit or crochet a scarf, and the women feel it's a real privilege to help out."

Osterer and Sternberg are among hundreds of Israelis who volunteer for Standing Together. The organization was founded in 2004 by David Landau, an immigrant to Israel from Queens, N.Y., who lives with his wife and eight children in Efrat.

Landau, 60, who owns a chicken, turkey, meat and fish delivery service called Landau's Super Clean Chickens, was walking around Rachel's Tomb one day, when he was suddenly experienced an epiphany. "I saw these soldiers in front of Rachel's Tomb. They were extremely scared, and there like sitting ducks. I thought, here are these kids, putting their lives on the line every single moment."

He went straight out and bought pizzas and drinks for them. "I told them, 'I want to thank you for what you are doing.' They said, 'What do you mean? We're just doing our jobs,' and I told them, 'No. You are doing much, much more than that,'" recalls Landau.

"Anyone serving anyplace, whether 18 years old or 35, in the regular army or on reserve duty, they deserve to be thanked," says Landau. "In fact, we have a tremendous obligation to thank them – the mitzvah of korat hatov – and we are there for them."

The pizza delivery at Rachel's Tomb was the first of many. Soon after, a pizza bag was donated to keep the pizzas warm, and financial support and volunteers began to roll in. Before long, Landau and his crew were making nearly nightly trips to bases and border crossings across the West Bank, and he was so busy building Standing Together that his son had to take over the chicken business.

In 2006, just before the war with Lebanon, the organization received a large donation and bought a small truck and trailer, to take their show on the road and bring treats to soldiers all over the country. "When the war broke out, we were ready to go down south to the border with Gaza and north to the border with Lebanon," says Landau.

That is just what they did. Unlike other, more bureaucratic organizations dedicated to supporting IDF soldiers such as Friends of the IDF and A Package from Home, Standing Together's flexible grassroots nature meant that that they were able to respond immediately to the war's pressing needs.

"While other organizations were putting together baskets and packages for each individual soldier, many of which didn't arrive until after the war, I just filled the truck with socks and underwear and toiletries, grabbed some volunteers, and went from stop to stop handing the stuff out," says Landau. "We gave to everyone – I don't even know who. But in times of war, you need things immediately. We work on that level, we do things on the spot. We help the soldiers with anything they need right when they need it."

After the war, Landau filled his truck with microwaves and personalized fridges, and drove from hospital to hospital delivering these items, along with personalized bathrobes, to injured soldiers.

Now, the organization does a mix of spontaneous and organized events, from late-night pizza, coffee, hot soup, ice cream and clothing deliveries to sponsored delivery nights (it costs $650 US to sponsor a night, and the truck can reach up to hundreds of soldiers) and hosting Independence Day barbecue parties at army bases, distributing Rosh Hashanah greeting cards from around the world and handing out challot baked by volunteers in Sderot.

"Whatever we are giving out is a secondary thing," says Landau. "The main thing is to show them that people care about them. It makes all the difference in the word for them to know that they are not alone and that people care about them."

His truck is now outfitted with an oven for heating pizza, a kettle popcorn machine, an espresso machine and a freezer with frozen treats, plus a laptop computer with satellite Internet access and an electrical box with 36 outlets, to enable soldiers in remote places to charge their cellphones.

Howard Osterer, left, volunteers with Standing Together, which hands out treats to Israeli soldiers. Osterer is with an Israeli soldier who was on patrol near the Gaza border.

"The soldiers are so taken aback by the outpouring of love from around the world," he says. "This is an easy way to boost their morale and make their lives a little bit easier."

This past Chanukah, Standing Together ran its fourth annual doughnut week, for which Landau brought his doughnut machine with him to bases in the Jordan Valley, Shechem, Nebe Musa and Kessufim, and made fresh doughnuts for the soldiers.

Osterer and Sternberg came along to volunteer. "One soldier told me, 'In the army, we don't even realize it's Chanukah. You showed up and made the holiday for us," Sternberg says. "When you see their smiles, it just warms the heart."

"Being there and seeing how appreciative our soldiers were was an experience that I will never forget," adds Osterer, who along with Sternberg intends to start a fundraising chapter for the organization in Canada. "Being there really made me feel the reason why I made aliyah, to really be part of something, part of a society that loves and cares for its soldiers."

Says Landau: "Standing Together tends to boost the morale not only of our soldiers, but of our volunteers, too."

Bringing Israeli culture to North America

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

It's fitting that the name of Ravid Dahan's international entertainment agency is Motek Productions. Translated from Hebrew, "motek" means "sweetie," and that's exactly what the 29-year-old native Israeli is.

Her energy is contagious, and it's obvious when you are with her that Dahan is a passionate person. As the creator of a company dedicated to bringing the best of Israeli culture to North America, she is supporting her homeland while enriching her new surroundings. Since she moved to Toronto three years ago, Dahan says she has fallen in love with the city.

"There are many things I like about Toronto, but what strikes me most is the strong Jewish community. I truly believe that it is a model for the rest of the world," she says. "When I set out to start Motek Productions, my dream was to make our community even stronger by bringing together Canadian and Israeli Jews through a shared love of Israeli music and art."

Dahan was raised in Kiryat Shmonah, a city in northern Israel on the Lebanese border. A ballet dancer for 14 years, she was once a performer on stage, but she began working in the entertainment business behind the curtain during her high school years.

After serving in the Israeli army and putting on productions with the entertainment unit, Dahan travelled the world before settling in Canada. She admits she felt a sense of guilt for leaving her country, but being a volunteer for many Jewish organizations in Toronto and the owner of Motek Productions, Dahan has maintained her connection to Israel.

"I now feel proud," she says. "I did my part in Israel by serving two years in the army. What I'm doing here is helping from afar. I was struggling for Israel's existence every day of my life living on the border. I chose to take a break from focusing on survival, and I now put my energy towards promoting my country in a positive way."

Through Motek Productions, Dahan says she has the power to do more for Israel from abroad than if she was still living in Kiryat Shmonah. With Israel so often portrayed negatively in the news, Dahan says her company will help people gain a broader understanding and appreciation of her country.

"Motek Productions is about showing a different face of Israel to the rest of the world. Being here, I have the time and the freedom to give back to Israel by showing Canadians how incredible my homeland is. I can bring Israeli artists to Toronto and show the community a different side of the country – the cultural side. Israel has really great music and really great artists, and we need to spread their talent."

Dahan says Motek Productions is also geared toward uniting the Jewish community and the Israeli community in Toronto.

Ravid Dahan is seen here with Ivri Lider, an Israeli pop-rock artist.

"We are one family, one people, brothers and sisters, long-life friends, but there is a separation between the two groups," she says.

"With such a large Israeli and Jewish population in Canada, Motek Productions can strengthen the community through the events and concerts we organize. We have enough enemies and enough people that look at us differently, that we have to come together and be strong. There are thousands of Israelis who live in the city, and they have to be welcomed."

Dahan says one of the ways to bring Israelis and Jewish Canadians together is "to show the Jewish community that lives here and knows about Israel and donates tons of money to Israel our culture, our music and our art, so they can feel for it too and be part of it with us. We're all Jewish and we're all the same. Motek Productions is showing the Toronto community that they can benefit from our events."

Aside from her Canadian team, Dahan says Motek Productions has a base in Tel Aviv run by Laura Dobrovickiy, the Israeli program and marketing manager. In the past year alone, Dahan has arranged three major concerts in Toronto, successfully unifying fans from all walks of life.

Her March 15, 2009, show, which featured Jewish reggae superstar Aharit Hayamim, was Dahan's "first jump into the waters" – an effort put together by her company to raise awareness for a cause close to her heart. The event served as a fundraiser for the family of Gilad Schalit, an Israeli soldier captured by Palestinian militants in 2006 during a cross border raid. Shalit has been held as a prisoner by Hamas ever since.

On June 4, Motek Productions held a concert at The Guvernment, where a mix of Jews and non-Jews danced for hours to the live music of Ivri Lider, one of the largest selling Israeli pop-rock artists. The night also marked the celebration of Tel Aviv's 100th birthday.

Nov. 15 was Motek Productions' "main focus for 2009," Dahan says, as her team worked around the clock to put together their largest concert yet for that date. Dahan arranged for Idan Raichel, an Israeli singer-songwriter known for his band's fusion of electronics, Hebrew lyrics and Middle Eastern and Ethiopian music, to perform a show at the Queen Elizabeth Theatre at Exhibition Place. Along with the Jewish Urban Meeting Place (JUMP), Motek Productions also organized a question and answer session, where part of the proceeds raised went towards funding JUMP's new centre.

While Motek Productions is a company primarily focused on events and concerts, Dahan says she strongly believes in giving back to the Jewish community. She has recently donated to many organizations, aside from JUMP, and is involved in promoting and selling tickets for the arrival of Omri Casspi, the NBA's first Israeli player.

In terms of what's to come, Dahan says Feb. 28 this year will be a night to remember, as Motek Productions is currently planning Toronto's biggest Purim party. Featuring Israeli hip-hop group Hadag Nahash, live in concert at the Mod Club, the celebration will take place at the beginning of Israeli Apartheid Week, with proceeds going towards the Vidal Sassoon International Center for the Study of Anti-Semitism at Hebrew University.

The winner of best costume will be awarded a free trip to Israel, including a fully paid 2010 summer course at Hebrew University, flight and accommodations.

Interactive play brings Orthodox wedding to life

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Yichud, Julie Tepperman's new play, is meant to simulate an actual Orthodox wedding, and audience members are treated like "guests," able to interact in a special pre-wedding ceremony.

Yichud follows the wedding of Rachel and Chaim. They are brought together through a shidduch, get engaged after a few chaperoned dates and marry shortly thereafter.

Julie Tepperman

"This play takes place on the day of their wedding. The theatre is going to be transformed into a synagogue," Tepperman says. Part of the play takes place in the yichud room, where the married couple goes to be alone together right after the ceremony.

The play begins with a pre-wedding ceremony. As the audience arrives in the lobby, "the men will be invited up to the the balcony to meet the groom, and the women remain in the sanctuary level," Tepperman says. "The women guests will be able to meet with the bride before the wedding and ask for a special blessing from her."

Mingling about with these "paying guests" will be a group of "volunteer wedding guests" doing pre-arranged things to give the whole thing a real feel. "A lot of stuff is co-ordinated to look spontaneous," Tepperman says.

Although male and female guests will be separated for the first half hour or so of the play, they will all be able to see everything that's going on. "Depending on where you're sitting, you'll get a different perspective."

During the unveiling of the bride, the men will be invited to go and meet the women. They can then watch the final third of the play together. "For the last part, the audience becomes flies on the wall, witnessing the wedding from their seats," Tepperman says.

This isn't the first of her plays to feature audience interaction, or what she describes as "organized chaos." Tepperman and her husband, Aaron Willis, Yichud's director, are the founders of Convergence Theatre, and their previous plays have also featured such "organized chaos."

In 2006, they produced AutoShow, in which seven plays were performed simultaneously in seven cars in a parking lot, as the audience moved from car to car. A couple of years ago, Dora-nominated Tepperman wrote one of the four plays in The Gladstone Variations, in which the audience moved from room to room in the Gladstone Hotel in downtown Toronto, following the play's actions.

In Yichud, the audience is also treated to an interactive experience and, in addition to mingling with the actors, can also chose to dance to music performed by a live klezmer band.

"It was never intended this way," Tepperman says. An earlier, shorter Fringe Festival version stuck to a more traditional stage setting. But when Theatre Passe Muraille got involved, the whole thing got bigger, and they decided to treat the play like an actual wedding.

"We realized it would serve the play better if the stage was like a synagogue. Everything is very similar to what happens at a real Orthodox wedding."

Tepperman is aware that Jewish weddings differ according to culture, and went with what suits the characters of the play best.

Tepperman and Willis, who play the couple, Rachel and Chaim, didn't have a yichud room at their real wedding. In fact, they hadn't even heard about the ritual "Later, I was working in a synagogue, and I accidently walked in on a couple in a yichud room," Tepperman says. "I think it's a beautiful ritual. It's the first time the bride and groom spend some time together to reflect on what is happening to them."

The play also takes on the larger meaning of the word "yichud" (seclusion), which refers to the separation between men and women in daily Orthodox life. During the play, action splits between three "yichuds" in three separate rooms that the audience is privy to. The audience also gets to see Chaim's two brothers, who have drifted apart, engage in an emotional and passionate discussion, as well as an argument between the parents.

"All of these emotional conflicts are heightened by the atmosphere of the wedding itself," Tepperman says.

Richard Greenblatt and Diane Flacks, the co-writers and actors of Sibs, play Rachel's parents. Greenblatt also serves as consulting director. Veteran actor Jordan Pettle plays one of Chaim's two brothers, and SummerWorks Theatre Festival's artistic producer, Michael Rubenfeld, plays the other.

The entire cast, in fact, is Jewish.

"That started off accidently," Tepperman says, but in the end it was a deliberate decision, as everyone was sensitive to the subject matter and didn't need to have the finer points of a Jewish wedding spelled out.

"We all understand what this is all about, although none of us is Orthodox, and we all relate differently to Judaism and Orthodox Judaism."

The set designer, Beth Kates, is also Jewish, as is the musical director, singer Aviva Chernick.

Tepperman says the play is sensitive to the Orthodox community and hired Shira Schwartz, a theatre practitioner and Orthodox woman as a consultant. "We are trying to be as accurate as to what happens at an Orthodox wedding as we possibly can."

Yichud, Tepperman says, is a sensitive, powerful and balanced look at relationships. "We really hope this play resonates with people on an emotional level, whether they are Jewish or not."

When the play's run at Theatre Passe Muraille ends, Tepperman hopes to take this production to other cities. "After you work on something for 2-1/2 years, you want it to last longer than three weeks." They are inviting artistic directors and producers from across Canada and New York, and even Mandy Patinkin, who will be in town later this month, to watch it.

Yichud runs Feb. 10 to 27, with previews Feb. 6 to 10, at the Theatre Passe Muraille Mainspace, 16 Ryerson Ave., Toronto. Guests are invited to show up 15 minutes early for pre-show wedding celebrations. Tickets at artsboxoffice.ca, 416-504-7529. www.passemuraille.on.ca

Mandy Patinkin and Patti LuPone play Royal Alex

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Mandy Patinkin met Patti LuPone 30 years ago, when the two were cast in Andrew Lloyd Weber's Evita on Broadway, for which they both won Tony Awards.

The veteran stars of film, television, concert and stage are back together again in the critically acclaimed An Evening with Patti LuPone and Mandy Patinkin, at Toronto's Royal Alexandra Theatre for six performances Feb. 9 to 14.

"About five years ago, there was a new arts centre outside Dallas, Texas, that was opening," Patinkin says. "They called Patti's people and said they had me, and they called my people and said they had Patti. They didn't have either one of us. It was one of those evenings that we would each do 30 minutes and then sing Getting to Know You and leave. I hate those evenings, so I was ready to blow it off.

"But, before I did that, I asked my piano player, Paul Ford, who has been my collaborator for 20 years, if he thought we could put together a show that would certainly be a concert and a high entertainment evening, but would also have a story and a structure.

"He said yes. I asked Patti if she was interested and she said, 'Go ahead, doll.' So I set about it with Paul, we gave birth to it, and we've been playing with it and tweaking it ever since. We're having just the time of our lives," Patinkin says.

When it came to the choreography, they called upon their good friend, Ann Reinking, a fellow Broadway veteran, who won a best choreography Tony Award for the revival of Chicago.

"Aside from the goal of the piece of being a good old-fashioned entertaining evening, I also say it is a figurative journey of two souls using familiar and unfamiliar material, both spoken and sung," Patinkin says.

"Each scene flows out of the next. There are many things we do together and several things we do on our own, but we are usually there supporting one another. Although, there are a couple moments that we are on are own."

[Brigitte LaCombe photo]

Patinkin says the show will include a mini-version of South Pacific, sections from Stephen Sondheim's Merrily We Roll Along and the entire bench scene from Carousel, which Patinkin says is "one of the most glorious pieces of writing that has ever been created."

Not to forget their shared Broadway roots, they will bring Evita into the mix when LuPone sings the crowd favourite Don't Cry for Me Argentina.

The two Broadway veterans have already taken this theatrical concert worldwide and plan to continue to do so for years to come, changing it as they go along.

"Patti and I are dear, old friends from that Evita experience, about 30 years ago. I look in her face and I feel like I'm 25 years old. When I'm with Patti, I'm back in time," Patinkin says.

"We want audiences coming out with a happy smile on their faces and to walk away from the world's troubles for one night in February. We have a great time doing it, and I believe you'll have a good time, too. That's our job to give you a good time."

Keeping busy, Patinkin is also performing in a new play called Compulsion, at the Yale Repertory Theatre in New Haven, Conn. Having had the concerts at the Royal Alex booked before agreeing to do the play, the production of Compulsion will shut while Patinkin is in Toronto and start up on his return.

When not on stage, Patinkin enjoys hanging out, hiking and biking with friends and family. He is married to Kathryn Grody, an actress and writer, best known for her one-woman play, The Mom's Life. She is working on a new play called Falling Apart Together. The couple has two grown children, Isaac, 27, and Gideon, 23.

'One Love' fundraiser for Haiti

Rita Marley, wife of the late reggae icon Bob Marley, is one of more than 20 entertainers participating in the One Love For Haiti event, a fundraiser for relief in Haiti.

The event, organized by Joel Hock and Corey Mandell of Solutions with Impact, takes place at the Kool Haus, 132 Queens Quay E., Toronto, on Feb. 6. Funds raised will be donated to Haiti through UNICEF and the Haitian consulate.

Bob Marley would have been 65 on Feb. 6. His mega-hit One Love is the backdrop for the One Love For Haiti fundraiser. "It is fitting that One Love For Haiti is being staged in Toronto on Bob Marley's birthday," says Rita Marley. "The nation of Haiti is in need, and we should all show One Love for Haiti."

The lineup includes Luciano; Jully Black; two-time Juno Award winner Blessed; Liberty Silver; Carvin Winan, of the acclaimed Winan gospel family, and sax player Ned Gould, who spent 20 years with Harry Connick Jr.

Showtime is 9 p.m. and doors open at 7 p.m. Tickets are $25.

Filmmaker starts chemical revolution

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Andrew Nisker thinks your toothpaste may be killing you. Sort of.

Nisker, a documentary filmmaker, recently premièred Chemerical, which explores how chemicals in household cleaners and hygiene products affect a person's quality of life.

While toothpaste may not lead to a slow, painful death, Nisker uses his film, which premièred at the Whistler Film Festival, to raise awareness about the chemicals found in everyday products and their natural alternatives.

"I want a cleaner environment for my son, who's turning six… it's time for all of us to do our parts to be sure these chemicals are eliminated from [our] homes," he said. "The bubbly kids' toothpaste is fluorescent blue. Where do you think that colour comes from? It's all chemicals."

Nisker's movie follows a family who have decided to live a chemical-free existence for three months. The Goode family purge themselves of all household cleaners and hygiene products, and start to make their own products, such as toothpaste.

"This is a point we make in our film. We don't need all of these things to clean. It's about how you clean, it's not about what you're cleaning with," Nisker said.

In his own home, the filmmaker uses vinegar, water and baking soda to clean, buys oatmeal soap and uses a crystal stone, a natural, mineral-based product, as a deodorant.

Through his movie, Nisker learned that chemicals are everywhere, from the formaldehyde preservative in baby shampoo to lead compounds in some lipsticks.

In the documentary, he also talks to a woman suffering from multiple chemical sensitivity, meaning she has a severe sensitivity to chemicals in products such as perfumes and gasoline.

"It's complete madness, what we're surrounded by," Nisker said about chemical-laden goods like air fresheners. "It may not be affecting you now, it may affect you in 15 to 20 years."

Before Chemerical, Nisker made Garbage! The Revolution Starts at Home, for which he asked a family to keep all their garbage for three months and discusses the impact our waste has on the environment.

Nisker's interest in the environment started when he developed asthma as a kid.

"Through asthma, I became sensitive to the environment. I [asked], 'Why do my allergies bother me, why is the air quality bad?'" he said.

Nisker, who's head of Take Action Films, turned to filmmaking to answer these questions.

"Film is a very powerful tool," he said. "[I wanted] to use film in a positive manner, where I can use my skills as a researcher [and] inspire a larger audience."

The editing process for Chemerical was about finding a balance, Nisker said.

"You want to tell the story in a way that's going to keep people entertained. We basically have an encyclopedia full of information, but we only have 75 minutes to tell our story," he said. "It's finding that balance between entertaining and story telling. That's kind of what we do in editing."

Nisker hopes his film will force viewers to pause before making their weekly purchases.

"I'm of the power to the people – that's my school of thought. You can go after governments and corporations and try to change the status quo, that's one model, that's going to take a long time. But you don't need to wait for that," he said.

"You can start right now by voting with your pocketbook, by supporting companies doing the right thing. Take power into your own hands and make your own products. That's kind of the next step."

A thoughtful account of the Arab world

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Neil MacFarquhar, currently the United Nations bureau chief of the New York Times, is an old Middle East hand.

As a foreign correspondent for the Associated Press and the Times, he was usually preoccupied with reporting fast-breaking news stories, but in his book, The Media Relations Department of Hezbollah Wishes You a Happy Birthday: Unexpected Encounters in the Changing Middle East (Public Affairs), he sits back quietly and reflects on his travels in the area.

Neil MacFarquhar

Having soaked up a plethora of experiences, MacFarquhar, an Arabic speaker, has produced a thoughtful account of a region yearning for reform but engulfed in authoritarianism and autocracy.

He begins with a reminiscence of his childhood in Marsa Brega, Libya, where his father, a chemical engineer for an American oil company, supervised a refinery and a water desalinization plant.

It was there, he writes, that the "gravitational pull" of the Mideast first manifested itself on him.

When the Six Day War erupted, MacFarquhar was nearly eight years old. In his diary, he observed that Cairo had just been bombed by Israeli aircraft. Concerned that Israel might strike Libya's oil wells, the Libyan government ordered the evacuation of American families from Libya.

As he looks back, he now realizes that the 1967 war shaped the course of much of his professional life and triggered an Islamic religious revival in the Mideast.

But as much as he is drawn to the Mideast, he says that it has been on the "wrong side" of history for the past century, and that it is mired in "suffocating bureaucracy" and "unhealthy nationalism."

These ailments are merely symptoms of a deeper malaise, he suggests.

Democracy is in short supply, corruption is rampant, and poverty and unemployment are deep-seated. "What I found in the Arab world, and Iran, is that the building blocks of a free society remain somewhat abstract in the face of more difficult, tangible problems."

Reform, he discovered, is something of a dirty word in Arab nations. "Anyone pushing for [it] is regarded as an American agent," he notes.

And because Arab reformers tend to work in isolation, he adds, the process of creating open, freer societies depends on dissidents chipping away at the traditional order rather than on any single organized movement. What reformers desperately want is less corruption and better government services.

MacFarquhar is critical of U.S. policy, claiming that Washington has not pushed too hard for "real reform," fearing that radical Islam will triumph at the polls, as Hamas did in the Gaza Strip.

In his view, repressive Arab regimes seek to balance their power and privileges with just enough openness to placate the "simmering frustrations" of the next generation. "Theirs is a generation watching the rest of the world advance while they stagnate," he writes.

Young Arabs regard the western war on terrorism as an assault on Islam and seethe over the inability or unwillingness of Arab leaders to improve the lot of the Palestinians, he notes.

Minority rule is also a contentious issue, since families, sects or military cliques monopolize the wealth and resources of countries such as Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Jordan, Libya, Morocco and Syria. Getting down to case studies, MacFarquhar lists the deficiencies of the Arab countries he has visited.

In Libya, from which he was expelled after a fairly brief visit, he finds grassroots resentment that its oil wealth has been siphoned off into southern Africa and that its African guest labourers have imported AIDS and petty crime.

Travelling to Lebanon, where his movements are closely monitored by Hezbollah, he senses the tension between Lebanon's desire to be a cosmopolitan East-West meeting ground and Hezbollah's struggle to accentuate Lebanon's Islamic heritage.

In Damascus, he stumbles upon an anomaly. Syria usually accuses the western press of presenting the Arab-Israeli conflict from Israel's point of view, yet the Syrian foreign minister rejects all his requests for an interview.

Still more contradictions abound in Syria. The president, Bashar Assad, is hailed as one of the founders of the Internet in Syria, yet, as MacFarquhar points out, his Baathist regime has worked tirelessly to curb its use.

If Syria is a long way from enjoying the fruits of democracy, its tyrannical political system and culture is to blame. As he puts it, "After decades of Baathist purges, any structured opposition has been destroyed."

To MacFarquhar, the absence of democracy in Syria is a source of regret: "The tyranny of the Assad regime casts a pall over what should be a delightful country, like pollution eating away some fine edifice."

The situation is not much better in neighbouring Jordan, though Jordan is arguably freer than Syria. He suggests that Jordan has "regressed" under King Hussein's successor, King Abdullah II, in terms of political reforms. King Hussein ushered in a period of liberalization, permitting free parliamentary elections and lifting martial law. His son, however, has not carried on his work, many Jordanians say.

MacFarquhar observes similarities in Morocco, which, he states, "mirrors its Arab brethren in that the entire system of law rests not on a framework of checks and balances but on the whim of a king." Morocco's former ruler, the late King Hassan, was a Machiavellian figure who brooked no dissent, while his son, a self-styled reformer, is not much different in practice.

Turning to Egypt, MacFarquhar leaves the strong impression that long-suffering Egyptians are running out of patience with the president, Hosni Mubarak, and that a cataclysmic event will touch off widespread rioting and topple his authoritarian regime.

Saudi Arabia's "modern veneer," MacFarquhar says, pulses to "a rhythm established in the seventh century, when the Prophet Mohammed founded Islam." He admires enlightened Saudis who chafe under its joyless restrictions but who engage in risky battles to reform its antiquated institutions.

He holds out hope that Al Jazeera, the cable network based in Qatar, can be an engine for reform in the Middle East. Al Jazeera has already altered the landscape of journalism with its criticism of repressive governments and its focus on heretofore taboo subjects.

But it is questionable whether Al Jazeera can alter the status quo in a hidebound region characterized by social inequities, political injustices and economic disparities.

Volunteering in Haiti on my own

By LIOR ETZIONY
JTA

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti — When I saw the news alert about a 7.0 magnitude earthquake in Haiti, I was in the Manhattan production house where I work. I am no geologist, but I knew enough to know this was a big one.

Though I quickly returned to work, by the next morning I had decided I couldn't go on as if nothing had happened. I wanted to go down there to help. I just wasn't quite sure how.

I called my good friend Dr. Craig Zebuda, who specializes in emergency medicine, and asked him to join me on a trip to Haiti. Craig agreed without hesitation.

I then got on the phone with Jane Oster, a philanthropist whose huge heart I knew I could count on.

"I want to help," I told her.

"So do I," she said. "What do you need?"

She gave me twice the amount I asked for.

The next thing I knew we were on a plane to Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic, on our own private rescue mission. The plan was to rent a car and drive to Haiti right after buying all the things we forgot to pack in the few hours we had to prepare for our journey.

> 'The scale of the disaster was beyond anything my mind could grasp'

But when we landed, no car rental agency would allow their vehicle to be driven to Haiti. Determined to get there, we teamed up with a strong-willed, Brooklyn-born Haitian woman we met at the airport named Regine, who was on her own quest to find her relatives in one of the most hard-hit neighbourhoods of Haiti's capital.

Hundreds of dollars later, cobbling together different forms of transportation, we arrived at the border only to learn that it was closed for the night. When it reopened in the morning, we boarded the roof of a little Haitian truck, making our way on a dirt road toward the capital.

As we approached Port-au-Prince, the pastoral countryside turned into an urban death trap. We were stunned by the scale of devastation and taken aback by the smell of decomposing bodies.

The driver stopped at the damaged National Palace, refusing to go farther.

"It's too dangerous," he said.

We made the last leg of our trip on foot, climbing a hill to search for Regine's family. The scale of the disaster was beyond anything my mind could grasp. Body parts extended from the rubble. Confused relatives sat nearby, their eyes dimmed with despair.

We found Regine's family members in good condition. Their house remained intact, surrounded by piles of rubble. Neighbours were digging with their hands through the debris. No rescue team was anywhere to be found in this part of the city.

It was about 72 hours after the quake, the voices of those trapped alive were fading and help could not arrive quickly enough.

We stumbled down the road carrying boxes of medical equipment, a camera and two backpacks as we looked for a place to stay for the night. We encountered the first international rescue team down the hill, just as they pulled an exhausted but healthy woman from the rubble of what used to be a seven-storey school.

It took me a second to recognize the accents. It was the ZAKA International Rescue Unit from Israel, which happened to be in Mexico when the quake occurred. It had teamed up with the Mexican delegation for the rescue mission in Haiti.

"We are here to help," we said.

"You cannot stay outside after sundown. You will get shot," they told us.

We jumped on their truck and were escorted by UN peacekeepers from Jordan, of all places, to the Green Zone at the airport, which was guarded by U.S. troops. Some 40 hours after we left New York, our mission to help the people of Haiti didn't seem to be very effective at that point. Exhausted, we fell asleep on the tarmac.

We awoke to the roar of a 747 jumbo jet – an El Al plane. Except for the Americans, who were out in force all around the city, the Israeli delegation seemed to us to be by far the largest, most organized and most effective team. We joined them, and from that moment on, our personal mission took a crucial turn.

At the crack of dawn, we already were on our way to build the largest field hospital in Haiti, an Israeli operation equipped with imaging and X-Ray machines, an emergency department, orthopedic surgeons and skilled support staff. By 10 a.m., the first patients were being admitted to the triage area.

Within a couple of hours, the hospital was operating at capacity, and the work flow from the triage area to the ER to the different clinics seemed seamless. Craig was working magic in the ER, and I was carrying stretchers, assembling cots and using my French to help translate the patients' Creole for the doctors.

The sleepless nights didn't matter now. We were finally doing what we came here to do.

Over the next two days, we saw a bleeding newborn, a wounded pregnant women, a man with a bullet wound in his chest, amputations and all manner of orthopedic injuries. Dehydrated and hungry, the patients were stabilized and treated quickly, proficiently and with a smile by the hospital personnel, most of whom were doctors in the Israeli army reserves.

These medical personnel were regular Israelis who left their families on short notice to cross an ocean, work around the clock and sleep in the field to care for people they never met.

After two days we went back into the city and found the lack of running water, electricity and food was taking its toll, pushing people to the edge. The atmosphere was very tense, and there were occasional riots. Prices for basic services shot up, and whoever had a car with a tank of gas was king.

We wandered around. The same desperate people were just where we left them two days earlier, but now that the dust had settled, reality seemed even gloomier than before.

As just two people on a rescue mission without any organization, we realized our ability to help these people was limited. We gave away all the medicine, batteries and food we had, and made our way to the Dominican border.

Before Craig and I parted, I asked him whether he thought two individuals alone could really make a difference.

"Do you think we were able to save anybody?" I asked.

"We were saving ourselves," he answered.

Hockey heroes visit the Holy Land

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

METULLA — When Paul Henderson and Darryl Sittler received invitations from the Israel Recreational Hockey Association (IRHA) to attend the 4th Annual Roger Neilson Memorial Hockey Tournament in Metulla, the Toronto Maple Leafs legends were eager to RSVP.

"Israel had been on our… list for years. [My wife and I] have always said this is one of the countries we want to go to, so when this opportunity came along, it was perfect," said Henderson, 67, who scored what many considered to be the "goal of the century" against the then-U.S.S.R. in Game 8 of the 1972 Summit Series, clinching the victory for Team Canada. "Eighteen years of pro hockey and scored only one goal. At least only one goal that anyone ever talks about," Henderson joked.

Sittler's reasons for coming had more to do with honouring the memory of Roger Neilson, who in addition to running a hockey camp in Metulla for four years, was one of Sittler's coaches when he wore number 27.

"I have a lot of respect for Roger Neilson, as a coach and a humanitarian. It was really meaningful for me to be part of a memorial tournament in his honour," said Sittler, 60, who still holds the record for most points in a single game – 10 – scored against the Boston Bruins on Feb. 7, 1976.

The tournament at the Canada Centre in Metulla late last month brought together six amateur teams – three from Israel, one from Toronto, one from Ottawa and one American.

Ottawa's lineup included former Tampa Bay Lightning defenceman Shawn Rivers; Jeff Hunt, owner of the Ottawa 67s OHL hockey club; and TSN and CTV sports announcer Rod Black.

The event was organized by Danny Spodek, a die-hard Leafs fan and immigrant to Israel from Toronto. Spodek is founder and president of the IRHA.

"I wanted it to be something special," said Spodek, 38. "When you bring your boyhood idol [Sittler] over from a foreign country, you want to make sure he has a good time."

It was no cakewalk. "Try putting together a hockey tournament in a country where nobody even knows what hockey is," said Spodek, who started organizing pick-up games in Metulla for ex-pat Canadians and Americans in 2004 and now runs a weekly game schedule for some 300 players.

"I love living in Israel, but I couldn't imagine having to give up playing hockey," Spodek said. "When we get out there on the ice, we forget about the fact that we're in Israel and we go back to our childhood."

Sittler was astonished to discover such a dedicated group of hockey-lovers in Israel. "It makes me really proud to see people driving four to five hours to Metulla every week to play hockey," the former Leafs captain said. "It's so nice that people are so passionate about it and put so much effort into carrying it forward here."

Sittler and Henderson flanked Canadian Ambassador to Israel Jon Allen when he dropped the puck to open the recreational tournament.

"I knew [hockey] was a very minute sport here in terms of fan interest," Henderson said, adding that you never would have known it from the atmosphere at the opener. "When that puck was dropped, well, everybody wanted to win. Boys are boys. We're fine until they drop the puck, then it's competition."

After the opener, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) hosted Henderson, Sittler and their wives for an intense week-long tour of the country.

"We wanted to introduce these Canadian icons to the whole of Israel, beyond the little snippets people see in the media," said Judy Zelikowitz, national manager of community services at CIC, who accompanied the group's guided tour across the country. "We wanted to show them our Israel from top to bottom, introduce them to Israelis and offer them briefings with political and military experts, to help them understand the country and the people and the precariousness of our existence."

Henderson said the tour was first-class. "It went way above and beyond our expectations. Everything has been amazing. It has been a wonderful experience," he said. "We have learned so much. In Canada, we are just so naïve about Israel and what's going on over here."

"This trip has really opened our eyes to the complexity of the issues here. It's been a real education," Sittler added. "I have also gained a real appreciation for the Jewish People and what they stand for."

"To understand the resilience of the Jewish People and what they have come from 60 years ago… it's mind-boggling," Henderson said. "You've got a country today, a military, a progressive society, commerce, and you're world leaders in a lot of fields. To me, there has to be a God, or you people wouldn't be here."

Henderson, a devout Christian who runs a men's ministry called the Leader Impact Group for over 800 men, was particularly touched by the sites of religious significance.

"As a student of the Old Testament, I was just blown away," he said. "You picture these places in your mind – Masada, the Dead Sea, the Sea of Galilee, the four churches, the Garden of Gethsemane – but man, this stuff is real. It put a lot more bricks in the foundation of my faith to actually see it."

For Henderson, the highlight of the tour was the trip to the Kotel (Western Wall). He went there to put a note in the Wall on behalf of his longtime Jewish friend in Toronto.

"I went down there, I put my note into one of the cracks, and then I put my hands on the Wall and started to pray, and man oh man, what's going on here? I got very emotional, which is something that caught me by surprise. I was overwhelmed by a sense of the awesomeness of God."

Among the highlights of his trip, Sittler lists the afternoon of volunteering they did for the non-profit leftover food rescue organization Leket. The group prepared some 1,200 sandwiches for delivery to needy schoolchildren in Israel's north.

"I just had the feeling the whole trip that this is a society that wants to give back, that wants to help people," he said. "[Israelis] are very giving people, and this was very evident in all the areas we travelled to."

The tournament's closing banquet on Jan. 28 was also Henderson's birthday. Spodek prepared a birthday cake and a DVD with good wishes from Henderson's family in Canada and from former Soviet goalie Vladislav Tretiak, who was the victim of the "goal of the century." Sittler delivered a moving speech about Roger Neilson and his first wife, Wendy, who both died of cancer.

All in all, it was a fitting end to an incredible week, Sittler said. "It was pretty magical. If the opportunity presented itself, I would love to come back."

Sittler admitted that as a kid, he used to be a Canadiens fan. "Jean Beliveau was my hero," he said. "My first year in the league, I got to face-off with him. How did I do? Who cares? I got to face-off with Jean Beliveau!"

Asked about the Leafs today, Sittler, who serves as a community representative for the Leafs in the fields of marketing, community and alumni relations, said that since the departure of Mats Sundin, the Leafs haven't picked a new captain. "They don't feel they have one player that fits the bill," he said.

Still, he's a die-hard Leafs fan. "Like all Leafs fans, I've been waiting since '67 for a [Stanley] Cup, but we need to make the playoffs first. I am waiting to see when we're going to turn this thing around."

Telling Sderot's side of the story

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — It has been a relatively quiet year in Sderot, the Israeli community of about 20,000 near the border with Gaza.

"We only had 307 rockets fired our way last year," says Noam Bedein of the Sderot Media Center. "That doesn't mean, though, that we can afford to lower our guard. The problems haven't been resolved. It's just a matter of time before the full rocket barrage starts again."

Bedein and his staff continue to work to tell the world what is happening in Sderot and the other communities in southwest Israel within rocket range of Gaza.

"Sderot is the bomb shelter capital of the world," he told audiences during a series of presentations he made in Winnipeg last month as part of a North American tour. "There is no other place in the world that is facing what Sderot has faced. Much of the world takes this for granted and gives legitimacy to terrorism. Our goal is to highlight the human side of Sderot's story – the trauma that people are feeling – and we are succeeding."

Bedein, 27, was born in Safed to American immigrant parents and grew up in Efrat. He came to Sderot originally to attend Sapir College, which offers one of Israel's best communications programs, he says.

"After my army duty, I had visited Tibet and seen the effects of Chinese repression," he says. "I had also visited the battlefields of Vietnam. After that, seeing what has become acceptable in Sderot is ridiculous."

He started the Sderot Media Center in September 2006, with just a telephone and a laptop. Today, the centre has a staff of six. Bedein, says it is the only active, non-governmental media centre in Israel.

"Our goal is to address the imbalance in media coverage," he explains. "Israel lacks the tools to counter the images of destruction and devastation in Gaza. We are focusing on presenting the human perspective from Sderot."

Bedein had one-half hour to try to present Israel's point of view at the Goldstone Inquiry last year.

He says that the inquiry was stacked against Israel from the start. "It is ridiculous to compare Israel's actions with those of Hamas and not condemn Hamas. We teach our children to run to the bomb shelters. They encourage their children to go to the roofs where they can become human shields. It makes for better publicity."

Bedein also appeared on Capitol Hill in Washington last year and has spoken on campuses and high schools in North America, Europe and Australia.

The Sderot Media Center ensures that when foreign reporters visit Gaza, they also hear Sderot's story.

The centre is reaching out in other ways. In January, Bedein and his staff organized the Sderot Rally for Hope to counterbalance the arrival in Sinai of 1,300 activists from 14 countries trying to get into Gaza in a show of solidarity with the Palestinians.

"We had just 10 days to organize our rally," Bedein says. "We had 85,000 people. We had fourth graders write messages to children in Gaza offering friendship. We organized a balloon parade and attached the letters to the balloons."

Another centre initiative is the Sderot Community Treatment Theatre. The program provided 40 teenage Sderot girls with drama therapy sessions to help them deal with their fear and trauma. The girls then produced a play called Children of Qassam Avenue. Over the next, six months, the centre is planning 12 performances of the play throughout Israel. You can contact the centre at www.sderotmedia.org.il. or info@sderotmedia.com.

GARLIC PITA CHIPS

1 stick unsalted butter
1 lg garlic clove, minced

4 whole pita breads

Melt butter with garlic and sea salt in small saucepan over medium heat or in microwave. Cut each pita bread horizontally along outside edges, gently separating each pita bread with hands into 2 flat disks.

Preheat broiler. Place 4 pita halves, insides up, in single layer on rimmed baking sheet. Brush pita halves with melted butter mixture. Broil just until pita halves are toasted and golden brown, watching closely to avoid burning, about 2 min. Repeat with remaining pita halves and butter mixture. Cool completely. Break pita halves into 2-3" pieces.

These are great for dips or as a snack.

Heart attack treatment moves to ambulances

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

It may not be the big city, but York Region is actually part of Canada's leading edge in medicine when it comes to treating heart attacks.

Recently, it joined Edmonton as one of two Canadian regions participating in a global trial looking into interventions by paramedics at the scene and on the way to the hospital.

Delay is the biggest enemy when it comes to heart attacks. "Every hour… significantly reduces the chances of surviving," says Dr. Warren Cantor, medical director of the Interventional and Invasive Program at Southlake Regional Health Centre in Newmarket.

Collaborating with York Region Emergency Medical Services (EMS), Cantor is heading up a new trial that allows patients suffering from a heart attack to receive potentially life-saving treatment in the ambulance on their way to the nearest cardiac centre.

Dr. Warren Cantor

Once paramedics have determined that the patient is experiencing a heart attack (with remote assistance from a hospital-based physician), the STREAM (Strategic Reperfusion Early After Myocardial Infarction) trial randomizes patients to receive either immediate angioplasty or a common clot-busting medication (Tenecteplase), followed by angioplasty within 24 hours.

All patients do receive angioplasty, usually considered the best initial treatment for a heart attack. The problem is, it's not available at every hospital. Specialized cardiac facilities are often several hours or more from a patient's location, especially considering that York Region covers a vast area including Simcoe, Dufferin and the Muskoka regions.

Heart attacks are often caused by the sudden blockage of an artery supplying blood and oxygen to the heart. Cantor hopes the clot-busting drugs will give patients more time to get to a cardiac facility before the heart suffers muscle damage.

Tenecteplase "dissolves the glue that causes the heart attack," says Kyle Grant, an advanced-care paramedic and coordinator for the York Region EMS clinical trials.

"In the past," says Cantor, "patients with chest pain were picked up by ambulance and taken to the nearest emergency department, whether or not the hospital had angioplasty facilities." Only once they got there would they be diagnosed by an electrocardiogram (ECG) and treated for their heart attack.

For the last two years, York Region advanced-care paramedics have been detecting heart attacks in the ambulance using the same ECG technology. "Unfortunately, that's not the norm throughout EMS in Ontario," says Grant, though it's becoming more common.

Once paramedics have diagnosed a heart attack, they can bypass the nearest hospital and bring certain patients directly to Southlake for treatment.

The STREAM trial builds on this capability, letting them take measures other than simply redirect the patient. Once Cantor has remotely confirmed the ECG results, they can administer clot-busting drugs to those who qualify and are randomized to that arm of the study. Previously, drugs could only be given by physicians once the patient arrived at the hospital.

The STREAM study builds on the common-sense intuition that "the sooner, the better" will save lives in cardiac emergencies. "If we reduce the delay… it should significantly improve the chance of the patient surviving the heart attack and significantly reduce damage," says Cantor.

Though the STREAM trial itself has only been going on for a few months, he is pleased with what he's seen so far. "Patients… have been accurately identified, received their treatments rapidly and appropriately, and have generally done very well. We've been quite pleased with our experience so far."

Participating in studies like the STREAM trial offers paramedics a "better understanding of more advanced cardiac care," which Cantor believes has a "ripple effect throughout [paramedics'] assessment and treatment of a wide variety of patients."

Trials like this are indicative of a broader "shift away from diagnosing and treating heart attacks in the emergency department, and moving it to the ambulance."

Other Canadian cities that will be taking part in the STREAM trial over the next couple of years include Halifax, St. John's and Winnipeg. Cantor says the study aims to enrol 2,000 patients worldwide; so far, only 500 have participated.

"In many regions of Canada, paramedics don't yet have the ability to recognize and treat heart attacks," says Cantor. "Regardless of what this study shows, the trend to move treatments to the ambulances will continue."

That will probably result in "better treatment for heart attack patients, in the cities, but even more so in more rural regions where patients can't get to an angioplasty hospital quickly."

Even in big cities, most people aren't aware that few hospitals have angioplasty facilities. This can lead to a common error in judgment: driving to the nearest hospital for treatment. Anyone experiencing symptoms of a heart attack – sweatiness, shortness of breath, neck, jaw or shoulder-blade pain or pain going down the arm – should call 911, warns Cantor, "not have a person bring them to the hospital."

Paramedics will ensure that they are taken to the most appropriate hospital and receive treatment that much more quickly. Patients shouldn't request that they be routed to a particular hospital, as paramedics follow medical directives based on many factors.

Grant agrees that attempts to self-diagnose and speed up treatment can be deadly. "I can't give you solid statistics," he says, "but it seems to be that about 50 per cent of the heart attacks arriving in hospital emergency departments are arriving by personal means. Those people are not calling 911."

Never be afraid to dial 911 if you suspect you or someone else is having a heart attack. "Give us a call," says Grant. "We'll be able to transport you to the most appropriate facility." Grant says expanding paramedics' knowledge and skills is empowering, allowing them "that much more of a pivotal role in [patients'] care."

Feedback Cantor has received from paramedics about the STREAM trial has also been overwhelmingly positive. "They're very excited to be part of this protocol."

Epilepsy doesn't define her, teen says

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Elisheva Eisenberg is a class clown. She loves to laugh, skate, swim and go for long walks. And she's had so many seizures that she can no longer do any of these activities alone.

Well, she can still laugh.

"What's going to come of not laughing?" Eisenberg, 19, said.

The Everest College student has had seizures since she was about 15 months old. She has various types of seizures, from partial, meaning she remains conscious but begins jerking, may stare blankly or has trouble moving; to generalized tonic-clonic seizures, formerly known as grand mal seizures, where she loses consciousness, convulses and sometimes loses urinary control.

Eisenberg has epilepsy. She frequently has seizures, which are caused when normal activity of nerve cells is interrupted in the brain by a sudden electrical discharge.

Eisenberg has fallen down concrete stairs, convulsed in class, and once collapsed on a crowded subway platform and was kicked onto the tracks.

But her worst fear is not of injury or pain. It's of what people will think of her.

Elisheva Eisenberg

"I had a teacher once who told me I was dangerous to her baby," she said, adding that the teacher had brought her baby to class. "This person, I can guarantee you she's forgotten... but it hurt so much that I don't even know if I can forgive her."

Eisenberg's worst memory is of her first month in Grade 9. An Orthodox Jew, she attended Toronto's Bais Chomesh High School. On the third day of classes, she had a seizure.

"I thought everybody knew [about epilepsy]. This was my biggest misconception... They had no clue whatsoever," she said.

"Nobody would talk to me... One [student] decided, 'She's contagious.' Another one decided, 'She has mental issues.' There were 26 different words to describe me, and they were all negative."

Eisenberg spent the next month, and most of the year, alone.

"I was at a loss as to what to do. I felt very confused. I decided, 'This ignorance stinks. I'll go through four years without talking to anyone.'"

Eventually, the student realized that the only real answer to ignorance is education. In Grade 10, her classmates began asking questions about epilepsy and she started answering them. Slowly, her peers learned that seizures aren't contagious and they're not dangerous unless they last more than five minutes. Most of the time, there's no need for an ambulance.

They also learned that the best thing to do when people are having a seizure is to move dangerous objects out of the way, gently roll them to their side if they're convulsing and avoid putting anything in their mouths.

"People don't fit in boxes, people are people. The whole thing of, 'You're different' – we're all human, so why do you really care? If you see something you don't recognize, find out. Don't stare and call people names," she said.

While working at a Jewish summer camp as a teenager, Eisenberg was fired – not for having a seizure, but merely for admitting she had epilepsy. In high school, while in the middle of a seizure, she heard someone yell out: "She's faking." Now, in college, she still has some problems.

"I had a partial seizure. These two women were sitting there, staring at me. They just didn't get it. [The next day] they said, 'You're back in school again. I thought you died.'"

But Eisenberg refuses to stop living. She still goes on her own to school, where she's studying to become a paralegal. She loves walking as much as she can, and she participates in all aspects of Jewish life, including fasting.

"I'm on a five-minute fast. I eat an ounce every five minutes," she said, explaining that this is because she can't allow her blood sugar to drop.

Eisenberg is also on a medication called Epival, an anticonvulsant that helps control her seizures. She takes 500 milligrams in the morning and 500 more at night. If she doesn't take it by a certain time, she starts to get a headache. If she doesn't take it at all, she begins to convulse.

Fatima Santos, the director of child and youth services at Epilepsy Toronto, is trying to spread Eisenberg's message. Santos is part of Epilepsy Ontario's new End Trash Talk campaign, which was started after a conference in the summer of 2008, where teens shared their stories and frustrations. The campaign aims to build awareness about epilepsy through videos, a public service announcement and a website.

"I think there's still a lot of preconceived notions about seizures," Santos said, adding that one in 100 people have epilepsy worldwide. "Our message, and this is what youth themselves say, is that everyone is unique. It's only a part of their lives."

Changes in your elders' social routine: could pride be stopping them from living life to the fullest?

Holidays are a perfect time for families to spend time together and get caught up again on each others lives. But sometimes what is discovered is very distressing and can change our life.

Sadie had been a widow for 15 years. She had a loving family of two sons and a daughter and eight grandchildren she adored. Sadie's children always knew their mother to be a very independent woman for her time. She had entered the professional world when it was largely dominated by men, had become a very successful accountant, had had a loving and close marriage for 48 years and appeared to her children to still enjoy getting together with her friends once a week for Mahjong and coffee, go shopping and cooking her meals.

During the Holiday celebrations the family thought it best Sadie stay over at her daughter's house for a couple of days. That way she didn't have to turn out in the cold each evening to go home. To the family's surprise Sadie resisted the invitation quite adamantly. She said she was very comfortable in her own place and would be fine. She felt the "young ones" should enjoy their time together and not worry about her. The more the family insisted, the more upset Sadie became.

Finally Sadie's family discovered the real reason behind their Mother's resistance and were both shocked by what they learned and ashamed they had not understood the situation earlier.

Sadie, like most seniors of her era, was too proud to let her family know that many of the activities of daily living we take for granted had become very difficult for her. Sadie had gone to great lengths to keep her lack of mobility and agility to herself and to her family's defense had done so incredibly well. They didn't realize that taking a bath was taking Sadie and hour or longer after which she would have to rest for another hour before she regained her energy enough to get dressed. Between family visits with extras Sadie asked them to bring, unknown to them friendly neighbours were dropping off essentials and meals if they didn't see Sadie out and about for a day or two.

The friends that Sadie told her family she would visit regularly for a game of mahjong no longer lived in her building and these games, when they did take place, instead of being enjoyable were very stressful for Sadie because getting there and back took so much out of her. The ultimate result was that Sadie had become more and more reluctant to leave the security of her own four walls, was not eating properly, was not exercising to help keep her aging joints supple and was getting little to no social or mental stimulation spending hours between family visits in front of the television.

Sadie's family immediately jumped into action. Besides the increasing frailties that naturally accompany aging, Sadie certainly did not require long term care. Too proud to ever become what Sadie believed would be dependent on her children if she moved in with any one of them, that also was not an option. If Sadie remained living at home but with daily caregiver services, that would offer her the physical help she required but her children worried that her social life, other than for their visits, would remain non-existent.

Independent retirement community living with Assisted Living Suites and Services proved to be the perfect solution to all Sadie's and her family's concerns.

Now, Sadie retains full independence in her one-bedroom private suite, and with the discreet services of trained professionals has the daily help she requires with her personal grooming.

Sadie's health and well-being noticeably improved as she began enjoying the vast variety of nutritionally-balanced meals served three times a day in a beautifully appointed dining room and, very importantly, now looks forward to sharing every day with great company and stimulating conversation.

Weekly housekeeping services that keep Sadie's suite sparkling, leave Sadie plenty of time to enjoy a mahjong game, right in her own building, keep her body healthy and supple in the gentle keep fit classes and time to enjoy one or all of the many activities organized daily.

Today Sadie feels more vibrant, well and happy than she has for many years. And her family is very thankful that the Holiday their Mother didn't want to be a part of ended up turning her life around for the better.

Food choices can help preserve memory

By JENNIFER LIBMAN
Special to The CJN

When it comes to preserving your memory, whatever is good for your heart is good for your brain, says Cheli Barokas-Agate, a registered dietitian who works with the memory intervention program at Baycrest.

"When we think about cholesterol narrowing our arteries, we often think about it decreasing blood flow to our heart, but it also decreases blood flow to the brain. If the amount of blood flow is less than it should be, the brain can't work efficiently. This can lead to memory loss," she said.

"A healthy diet can help manage and prevent chronic conditions like diabetes or hypertension that may contribute to memory loss."

Barokas-Agate always encourages her patients to follow Eating Well with Canada's Food Guide, a diet planning tool produced by Health Canada. By following this guide, she said, patients can be assured that they're consuming a balanced diet and getting the nutrients they need from all four food groups.

According to the food guide, adults should be consuming between seven and 10 servings of fruits and vegetables each day, she added.

"This is due to their high levels of antioxidants, which have been linked to memory improvement in older adults."

Cheli Barokas-Agate

While all fruits and vegetables can be healthy choices, she emphasizes cruciferous vegetables such as broccoli, cauliflower or brussels sprouts, as well as leafy green vegetables including spinach, kale and cabbage. She also encourages people to prepare these vegetables with small amounts of oil or other fats. This releases the fat-soluble vitamins from the vegetables and makes them more readily available to the body.

When grocery shopping, Barokas-Agate tells people to purchase exotic fruits and vegetables that they have never tried before. "This can help keep meals fresh and people excited about eating healthy. Variety is 'the spice of life.'"

Barokas-Agate also reminds patients to eat whole fruits and vegetables rather than taking vitamin supplements. "There are so many aspects of whole foods that work in synergy with one another – this cannot be found in a pill form."

In addition to eating fruits and vegetables daily, Barokas-Agate recommends eating two servings of oily fish per week such as salmon, mackerel, or herring.

"These fish are sources of omega-3 fatty acids, which may play a similar role as antioxidants in preserving memory. Purchasing omega-3 fortified eggs can be a good option for people who don't eat fish weekly."

Barokas-Agate recommends consuming beans, lentils and nuts on a regular basis. "This is not just advice for vegetarians. By consuming more vegetable proteins people will naturally consume less red meat. This can play a role in reducing cholesterol, which can help maintain memory."

She reminds her patients to choose whole grains when eating breads, cereal, pasta and other grain products. These are the least processed so they contain the highest amounts of vitamins, iron and fibre. Whole grains are also digested more slowly by the body, which results in more stable blood sugar and a higher feeling of satiety. With so many whole grain options on the market now, choosing them has never been easier.

When it comes to dairy products, Barokas-Agate recommends consuming low-fat milk and milk products daily, and taking 400 IU of vitamin D for adults over the age of 50.

The most important piece of advice Barokas-Agate has for people making dietary changes is to be forgiving with yourself. "Changing the way you eat can be overwhelming, and it is important not to be discouraged if you do not follow this advice every day. It is never too late to improve your diet and every small change helps."

Kids aren't the only ones who can have ADD

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Howie Mandel, Robin Williams, Whoopie Goldberg, Michael Phelps and Benjamin Franklin have something in common, says David Teplin, a Richmond Hill clinical psychologist.

They all have attention deficit disorder (ADD), he said, characterized by inattention and impulsivity.

Although often thought of as a childhood disorder, research in the past 10 to 12 years has shown that some 70 per cent of those with childhood ADD or ADHD (attention deficit hyperactivity disorder) continue with it into adulthood, and many are living with it undiagnosed or untreated.

"Often they have a child who is diagnosed, and they begin to think that, as a child, they were the same. It is then that they may get diagnosed."

ADD in adults, he said, often presents as an inner restlessness or irritability. "They can't sustain attention, they are disorganized, they are easily distracted, they often lose important items, and they may talk excessively.

The inner restlessness could cause people to quit jobs suddenly, end relationships quickly, drive too fast, lose their temper, abuse drugs or alcohol, and have a low frustration level, he said.

Don't let anybody tell you it's easy to quit

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

I had my first cigarette when I was 9 with my friend Tonio, and started smoking regularly sometime in Grade 10. By the time I was studying journalism at Ryerson, I was smoking a pack a day, even more on weekends. Much more sometimes.

The night before Labour Day, 2008, at 42, I smoked my last cigarette. I woke up one morning, after a weekend of barbecues and pool parties and smoking about three packs in two days, with a nasty headache and scratchy throat. I coughed half a lung out in the shower and thought to myself, "That's it."

Of course, as every smoker knows, that wasn't it. It took a bit more persuasion. It wasn't easy, but it's not something I regret doing and hopefully, it's not something I can ever see doing again. I hope these six highly unscientific steps that worked for me may help you or someone you care for quit.

Step 1: Quit cold turkey. Don't "cut down."

I had already cut back to about half a pack a day over the past few years. I had no choice, as it was getting difficult to smoke anywhere, even in my own house. But my attempt that week to slowly cut down from half a pack to nothing was futile. Maybe by the end of that week, I had cut down to 11 from 12, but on the weekend, the number went back up again.

Trevor Miller Illustration

You will always make excuses. "I've had a stressful phone call, I deserve a cigarette."

How often do you hear smokers say, "I'm cutting down"? Some have been "cutting down" for years. Just do it. Throw out your pack and start your new life.

Step 2: Don't give yourself a deadline.

The best time to quit is right now. Not next week. Not in the summer. There's always an excuse. "Well, I said I'd stop when I turn 40, but my friends threw me a party and I had a few drinks and… blah, blah, next thing I knew I was 50."

Just quit.

Every smoker talks about quitting "someday." Sometimes "someday" is tomorrow. Other times, it never really comes. I've thought about quitting many times and made half-hearted attempts over the years. When I finally did stop, it wasn't because my doctor told me to, or because of pressure from my loved ones, or because it was getting expensive.

Quite honestly, I grew tired of it.

The Friday night of the Labour Day weekend, a week or so after that barbecue weekend in August, I sat on the porch smoking, and I suddenly decided that this would be the last one. There was no fanfare as I butted what I thought would be my last cigarette out in the rusty old can.

You really need to want to quit smoking

I opened the nicotine gum I'd bought, and started to chew, the way it said on the package: "Chew, chew, park." It tasted slightly worse than day-old vomit, I suspect, but it did the trick, I think. I lasted without a cigarette until Saturday afternoon, when my brother, also a smoker, dropped by for a visit. Soon he asked me if I wanted to go outside for a smoke. Not wanting to be like a prima donna and make an "I quit smoking. I'm so much stronger than you" scene, I acquiesced.

I would quit on Sunday instead.

But on Sunday, my sister called inviting me to her house for a barbecue. Along with the hamburgers came the beer and again, not wanting to make a scene, I lit a cigarette as I always did.

But on Labour Day, I kept myself free of social engagements and did quit.

Step 3: Tell people you're quitting. Don't keep it to yourself.

I'm a "keep it to myself" kind of guy. Never particularly extroverted, I thought I would keep my quitting a secret. This way if (or when) my attempt to quit failed, no one would think less of me for being weak and give me that "I knew it" look. I've seen people tell me they've quit countless times, only to see them smoking a week later.

The first person to find out I quit was my neighbour Wanda. As I got into my car one morning maybe a week after I quit, she was out tending her flowers and she looked at me. "Joe, I don't see you outside smoking anymore. What happened? You quit?" she asked me.

"Yes," I said and all of a sudden a weight lifted off my chest (in all likelihood it was a weight made of tar and nicotine). I did quit. And I was proud.

I started to tell my family and people at work. The reason I encourage you to do this is that it's another defence against falling into temptation.

When that annoying craving came and I was dying for a cigarette, the knowledge that my nosy neighbour Wanda was looking out her window, or that my colleagues at work would see me sneaking out for a cigarette, stopped me.

Telling people is an extra incentive. And telling people also helps them understand why you're being so short-tempered with them.

Step 4: Stay strong.

Quitting smoking was probably one of the hardest things I ever did. I was tense, short-tempered and angry. The toughest moments were the ones I always associate with smoking – like first thing in the morning, after lunch or supper, before and after I drove (I never smoked in the car) and before I went to bed. As every smoker will tell you, smoking is not just a physical addiction. It's very psychological as well. You smoke after supper because it's something you always do. And it feels good.

You may want to try aids like the nicotine gum or the patch. I tried the gum for a few days, but I found I was getting addicted to it. One morning in the shower, I was salivating at the thought of chewing the nicotine gum. I decided to throw the pack away. I was just substituting one addiction for another.

Step 5: Really want to quit.

You're not going to quit for long if you don't really want to quit. I decided that August that I really wanted to quit. It was unhealthy. It was dirty and unsociable. You often had to stand outside buildings like a prostitute. Really wanting to quit can get you past the hurdles, like the cravings and the weight gain. Find something healthy to munch on. Substitute carrots for chips. Water fills you up with minimal calories. Find something else to do with your fingers.

I was restless at night. I had trouble sleeping for a couple of months, but these days, I am able to fall asleep the second I hit the pillow, something I haven't been able to do in all my adult years.

I missed smoking. A lot. I had dreams about smoking. One evening after watching the news, I put on my shoes and jacket and went outside, just as I did for years. I stood there in the driveway before I realized I didn't smoke anymore.

Don't think it will be easy. The cravings can last for three months – longer for some people. But they will go away in time.

Step 6: Reward yourself.

Quitting smoking is a reward in itself. Trust me, fewer things feel better than quitting smoking. You feel a lot better, for one thing. And you smell better. I can now smell a smoker a mile away. But reward yourself materially too. You deserve it. People say I must be saving a lot of money since I quit. Not really. I've never stopped rewarding myself.

ADD can be treated

"Especially common is a paralyzing procrastination and poor time management, and they often over-schedule themselves."

Although ADD can't be cured, said Teplin, it can be treated – the first line of treatment is medication – "and anyone who feels these symptoms apply to them should have a comprehensive assessment.

David Teplin

"From a 'brain' point of view, it has been discovered that people with ADD have deficits in their frontal lobe functioning. Essentially, they often lack an editing button. Undiagnosed and untreated, ADD can affect everyone in the person's path," Teplin said.

"Because the drugs are stimulants, patients see changes within the first few days, but we recommend that they start slowly, to ensure that there are no disabling side affects. We also suggest psycho-social treatment such as strategic interventions," he said.

On a positive note, Teplin said, ADD can be a gift. "People with ADD often have high IQs, are quite creative and think outside the box. They march to their own drum, and in their own niche, they can do extraordinarily well.

"However, asking them to sit at a desk all day will not work. They have to find ways to explore their gifts."

Jo-Anne, an aerobics instructor who always had difficulty organizing her papers, managing a budget and being punctual, said that "it always bothered me, but I thought it was just me. I would laugh at myself for being late, for double booking dates and for fidgeting."

It wasn't until her son was diagnosed with ADD and was managed properly that she thought of getting help for herself.

"I consulted a psychologist, and after he talked to me at length, he thought I could benefit from medication," she said.

"After a few weeks, I noticed that I had more time for myself. I used to spend hours hunting for papers, re-arranging dates, and aimlessly wandering around the house. I won't say my personality changed, I just became a little calmer. It was easier to think things through."

She had always "pooh-poohed" most medications, she said, "but I'm converted. I understand that it's not a weakness to take medication. Between my son and myself, the medication has calmed down our household. It's not a noticeable difference to an outsider, but it's a huge difference to us."

With BJCC closed, members have new fitness routines

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

When the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) closed on Sept. 27 last year, it was the end of an era for longtime fitness members.

Many of them are still adjusting to new workout environments and routines, as well as to a sense of loss for a place that served them as a community.

The 48-year-old centre on the Sherman Campus is slated to be torn down and rebuilt, a process expected to be finished in 2014.

In the meantime, fitness facilities – state-of-the-art cardio and weight machines, as well as classes including yoga, Zumba and Pilates – are available in an adjacent building. The newly built Donald Gales Family Pavilion, which opened Oct. 5, is part of the Prosserman Jewish Community Centre (the "entity" that includes the building replacing the BJCC and operates primarily out of the pavilion).

The new facilities are part of a renovation of the 27-acre campus, which also includes the newly renovated Lipa Green Centre and the Leah Posluns Theatre, which will be rebuilt. The entire project is expected to cost between $150 and $200 million.

The pavilion – a 40,000-square-foot, $10-million building next to the still-standing BJCC and connected by an indoor bridge to the Lipa Green Centre – also houses administrative offices and other programming, including educational and culinary programs, as well as seniors programs.

Currently, Prosserman has an athletic membership of just over 650, according to Bryan Keshen, Prosserman JCC executive director, who responded to questions from The CJN by e-mail.

Before the BJCC closed last fall, it had more than 1,200 fitness members.

Those who played squash, racquetball and tennis are particularly bereft: the new facility will not have courts for them. As well, pool users will have to wait until the building that will replace the BJCC is completed to be able to swim at the site again.

In 2006, then-BJCC executive director Sherry Kulman said no squash or racquetball courts were planned for the new building because of high cost and low demand. She said at the time that only about 100 members actually played squash and racquetball and that space constraints would make it difficult to include those courts.

Squash player Helen Zicherman, 54, used to play three or four times a week and participate in a wide variety of fitness classes at the BJCC. With a connection to the centre dating back to her high school days, she was "very upset" when she heard it was going to close.

"It's really nice to walk into a place you've been a member of forever, and you know people. It's like part of the community. People were practically in tears [when they heard the news.]"

But, she said frankly, the facilities were "not great," and the health club was "run down."

Keshen says the condition of the BJCC was "one of the reasons why a new facility was essential.

"The facilities at the new Prosserman JCC are exceptionally well maintained," he said. "We're not looking back, we're looking ahead to growing membership… and a proud, new building."

In the meantime, Zicherman divides her workout hours between the Columbus Centre 7.6 kilometres away – which she joined so that she could continue to play squash – and the Gales Pavilion, where she takes fitness classes with friends who have stayed.

On the positive side, the fitness instructors at the Prosserman are "fabulous," Zicherman said. As well, she said, "it's still nice to walk in, and you do recognize a lot of people."

But "there's not the same feeling," she added. "Everyone's dispersed."

In addition to the Columbus Centre, she said she knows people who have gone to Mayfair Racquet and Fitness Clubs and the North York YMCA.

She said she knows a lot of members who left before the BJCC closed because they knew it would be closing.

As well, Zicherman said, her husband, George, whom she got to know at the BJCC some 35 years ago, will not return to the BJCC, because there will be no squash courts for him to use.

In addition, being a member of two clubs is more expensive for her – and less convenient.

Badminton aficionado Jeff Cooper, 55, used to play three times a week at the BJCC, and – along with some of his former badminton partners – has tried out half a dozen other locations in recent months. For now, the group has settled on two community centres, once a week each, at times designated for badminton. At first, they were "kind of lost," Cooper said.

A member of the BJCC – originally the YM-YWHA – from the time he was a young child until university, and again from 1995 until last year, Cooper said he didn't consider giving up badminton if he could find a venue.

The end of an era for fitness buffs

"I find it fun – it's a good workout," he said. He particularly enjoyed his last few months at the BJCC because there was more opportunity to play: once members heard the BJCC would be closing, some of them went elsewhere, leaving more court time for those who stayed. "I was playing more badminton than I every played," said Cooper, whose father taught him the sport at the then-Y when he was a child.

Now, he said, depending on the day, the location, and how many other players turn up, he sometimes has to spend more time than he would like waiting for his turn on court.

"We look back now and kind of regret that we lost what we had," he said. "We're running here and there [from one facility to another]."

However, Cooper noted, the BJCC had deteriorated noticeably by the fall, and for that reason, he wasn't sorry to see it close.

Karen Fabian, who is in her early 60s and swam three or four times a week at the BJCC, joined the Columbus Centre, following a brief stint at another facility.

She said the closing of the BJCC was "a shandeh" (shameful) for its breaking up of a community. "It's just sad, because it seemed really unnecessary, and it also seemed insensitive. I felt especially bad for the seniors."

Hilary Edelstein, 26, stayed at the Prosserman mostly because of the fitness classes, notably spinning and yoga, and their "phenomenal" instructors. She joined the BJCC when she was 18 and takes classes three or four times a week.

She noted, however, that "for the price that I'm paying, I could be getting more in terms of amenities elsewhere."

Lily Kraft continues to take fitness classes at the Prosserman Centre.

An adult or senior membership at the Prosserman is $75 a month (teens and students to age 25 pay less). That's lower than the fee was for health club members at the BJCC, but more than what general fitness members paid.

A PhD student at the University of Toronto's Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, Edelstein said one advantage for her is that she can use the Miles Nadal JCC downtown up to four times a month, because it has a reciprocal arrangement with the Prosserman.

Lily Kraft, 54, (no relation to the writer of this article) takes classes at the new Gales Pavilion, but has thought about leaving. She said location, sentimental reasons and "top-calibre" classes are keeping her there for now.

She is not happy about the new facilities and what she termed "construction issues," including unreliable water pressure in the showers, and hairdryers shorting out. "It's very disappointing."

Keshen maintains that "a few adjustments were required when the Prosserman athletic facilities first opened, but they were quickly dealt with and corrected."

Kraft, a BJCC member since the early 1990s, said she "felt like Tevya being exiled from Anatevka," and that she misses the sense of community at the old building.

Although she does not play racquet sports, Kraft was among 600 people who signed a petition protesting the decision not to have racquet facilities at the new centre. "I think it was very short-sighted of them not to include it," she said. "At the end of the day, we felt our voices were not being heard."

She believes the new building, which was not originally planned to house fitness facilities, was designed "as an afterthought."

Keshen said the Gales Pavilion was redesigned to accommodate athletic facilities because members did not want to be without them until the new JCC building was constructed. "The decision to provide fitness facilities, although not in the original plans, resulted from extensive consultation and community needs."

On a more positive note, Kraft said that Zumba fitness classes were added to Prosserman's schedule after she wrote a letter to Keshen in September, asking him to reconsider the initial decision not to offer them at the new pavilion.

For Rabbi Moshe Stern, spiritual leader of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation, the closing of the BJCC meant switching to a new facility after 25 years of working out virtually every day (Shabbat and Jewish holidays excepted). Two or three years ago, he switched from the stationary bicycle to the elliptical machine as his main mode of training.

"What they had to offer did not fit my needs," said the 66-year-old rabbi, who wanted to continue using a steam room and to have access to more extensive facilities. The men's change room has only four showers, he noted. (Women have five.)

Rabbi Stern has switched to the Columbus Centre, where he has much praise for the staff and facilities. But it was "a wrench" to leave the BJCC.

He says that the older seniors who were BJCC members were affected most by its closing. "A guy like me, you come, do your thing and you leave," he said. "People into their 80s, even early 90s, would spend hours there. This was their home away from home."

He admits to being disillusioned by the BJCC. "The main building was supposed to be torn down a year ago. Then they extended it, so we hung in there. Then they let us know they're doing it in June. Then June came, and they said September."

The delays, Keshen said, were to ensure that the facilities at the Gales Pavilion were in place before anything was torn down.

In addition, Rabbi Stern said, there were no plans to offer health facilities while the JCC was being rebuilt. Plans changed only after there was an outcry from the membership, in an attempt to "placate" them, he said.

Now, when he drives past the building, he wonders why he and other members aren't still able to use it. "Why couldn't they just clean it up?" he asks.

The rabbi would have preferred to see the old building refurbished at a lower cost, because Jewish schools need funding urgently, he said.

Keshen said that two separately commissioned reports concluded that "a new state-of-the-art building would be more cost-effective than repairing the old one."

Howard English, spokesperson for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, under whose auspices the Prosserman operates, said that "in the most general terms, retrospectively, I suppose you could have always done things better and you could have always done things worse… We're looking forward to ensuring that the Prosserman JCC remains a bustling hive of activity."

Unprepared for motherhood

By MARNI BRINDER BYK
Special to The CJN

On Sept. 10, 2009, I heard the words that will change my life forever – "You're pregnant." While sitting in front of my doctor in disbelief, I realized one thing: I was totally unprepared to be a mother, although my husband and I had been trying to get pregnant for two years.

We had spent the past two years taking endless pregnancy tests that never displayed a plus sign, extra blue line, pink line, or the word "pregnant." I truly believe that from

Marni Brinder Byk

September 2007 to 2009, I was solely responsible for keeping the pregnancy-test industry solvent while the rest of North America's economy suffered. Oddly enough, when I finally was pregnant, it was a doctor, not an at-home test, that shared the good news.

I can't help but compare a wedding to giving birth. I always made fun of women who worked so hard at planning their weddings, only to be shocked that it was the marriage that really needed the work. I was always the kind of person who was planning for the marriage.

I should have kept my mouth shut, because from the day my husband and I started trying to conceive to the day I learned I was pregnant, I did absolutely nothing to prepare for motherhood. Instead, I focused on hormones and cycles, fertility foods and such, to finally make a home pregnancy test turn whatever colour, shape or word that would finally give me a baby. Who had time to learn what colostrum, meconium or swaddling was? I never thought about how difficult breastfeeding could be or which pump I should, could, or would eventually use.

Over the last six months I have learned more horrifying, terrifying and mind-blowing facts about babies than I thought I ever would. What is most shocking is that every one of my girlfriends is absolutely amazed that I had never heard of or thought about these things in my 32 years on earth.

I know I am not alone. Not everyone has baby knowledge or knows whether or not to buy a bumper pad for a crib. I have been reading What to Expect When You're Expecting, and mostly have learned that every week my baby resembles a different fruit, from the size of an avocado to a grapefruit. The book has only added to my hunger. There have been some useful tips I have taken away, but I am still stuck in pregnancy mode and am no further prepared for motherhood. My husband is no better, unfortunately. Just this morning, I informed him that you don't give baby food to a newborn. He was actually shocked.

All in all, I have to believe that two responsible people in their 30s will figure out how to be the best parents a son could ask for, and if we get confused somewhere along the way, I know we will find the answer somewhere. Isn't that why God created bubbies?

Colon Cancer is Preventable

Like screening for breast, cervical, and prostate cancer, colon cancer screening is necessary and saves lives. The endoscopist carefully looks in your colon for abnormalities such as polyps (growths that can become cancer), and removes any polyps during your colonoscopy.

Advantages provided by the Vaughan Endoscopy Clinic include:

- ✓ Wait times for appointments are considerably shorter.
- ✓ Patients achieve their consultation and endoscopy in one visit
- ✓ The clinic uses the most advanced equipment and technology.
- ✓ The clinic is in a medical facility designed for patient comfort.
- ✓ Anesthesiologists administer conscious sedation for patients.

The first Sunday in the new year is a bitterly cold day. The wind blows snow across Toronto's Allen Expressway, and the road is slippery. Few people venture out on this bleak winter morning.

In the Dufferin and Finch area, almost all the parking lots are empty. But the lot at 4544 Dufferin Ave. is practically filled to capacity. The inclement weather has not deterred participants in the Harvey Brooker Weight Loss Program for Men. (416-222-9887).

The men meet Sunday mornings at 9:30 in a large second-floor office suite, and on this day 100 men of varying ages and sizes have shown up for their weekly dose of inspiration from their weight loss guru.

Harvey Brooker, 65, has been involved in weight management since 1971, when he and his wife, Helen, ran the Diet Workshop.

Brooker launched his own program in 1985 because he felt there was a need for a weight loss program geared to men. "I thought if I could isolate the men, it would give them the comfort level to learn about nutrition and exercise.

"I thought it would be a safer place for them to share their experiences and that they would be able to support each other."

Having maintained a 50-pound weight loss for some 40 years, Brooker knows from personal experience that focusing on healthy living is critical.

"Most men don't start paying attention to their health until they get sick. My job is to get the guys to make their health a priority."

He stresses there's "no miracle cure" to weight loss. "There's no easy way. You have to be trained by regular attendance at the meetings and midweek coaching. The meetings are free to maintainers (people who reach their goal weight)."

Attending a meeting is also free for prospective clients. They can call or visit the website at www. harveybrooker. com.

Brooker started with 12 men, now he gets an average turnout of 140 men a week. "Until 1998, we never had more than 30 guys. I didn't realize I had to promote and market the program to reach the public."

Since then he's had considerable local media exposure- newspaper articles, radio and television spots– "getting the word out."

Now he has an international audience. His first book, It's Different for Men: The Men's Weight Loss Strategy for Health, Wealth and Sexual Vitality (John Wiley & Sons Canada Ltd.), published in 2008, is selling worldwide.

Back at the Jan. 3 meeting, a tanned Brooker, looking trim and dapper in a two-piece suit, energizes the room when he makes his entrance.

Home after a "dream vacation," he took with his wife, children and grandchildren, Brooker begins his talk by describing his son-in-law's observations about the mass amounts of food consumed by other vacationers on their cruise. "My son-in-law said, 'These people are killing themselves. They don't love themselves.'

"I told him that's what I talk about on Sundays. If you aren't looking after yourself, you don't love yourself."

Brooker is able to create an intimate atmosphere that fosters bonding among group members. "We have a team here of all the guys in the room," he tells the men.

When individuals get up to talk about their progress and/ or struggles, they receive applause of support from fellow participants. On this day they're clapping for a man named Joel. He announces that after losing 81 pounds, he no longer needs his medication. Ditto for Sandro. He's down 48 pounds and also off his meds.

Rabbi Elie Karfunkel, spiritual leader of the Forest Hill Jewish Centre, has been a Sunday regular for the last two years. He says he was unable to lose the weight on his own. "The program made the most sense for me. There are no gimmicks. Harvey has given me motivation, inspiration and an education."

The rabbi has lost 40 pounds and kept the weight off for a year and a half, but it's an ongoing personal struggle, he says. "Harvey is involved in holy work by helping people help themselves."

Rabbi Karfunkel says as an Orthodox rabbi, he is a role model. "Being in self-control in all areas brings ultimate happiness. Eating whatever I see is not a good reflection of what I want to stand for."

Another Sunday regular is Eric Cohen, 50, a manager in accounting operations for the provincial government. Cohen has kept off the 80 pounds for six years.

Sticking to the program turned out to be easier than the father of two expected. "I thought I would be missing french fries… Your tastes change after awhile and you don't miss the old foods."

He says salads are now a diet mainstay, and he has cut back on hard cheese and beef.

He stresses that losing the weight was easier than keeping it off. "You reach the point when you lose weight and you think, 'I can slack off a bit.'

"Then you start gaining weight and you realize this is lifestyle change. It's not short-term."

Cohen started exercising after losing the first 40 pounds. He started walking on the treadmill half an hour a day and progressed to running five kilometres three times a week. He also does weight training.

Being active has its payoffs, he says. "I can do more things with my children. I go running with my 16-year-old daughter, and I climbed the CN Tower with my younger daughter."

Completing a 100-kilometre bike ride this summer was also very gratifying, but his crowning physical achievement was climbing Mount Kilimanjaro, Africa's highest peak, in 2008. Only six out of the group of 16 made it to the summit and Cohen was one of them. "It was a once in a lifetime opportunity. I have a picture of me at the top of the mountain holding Harvey's book."

Harry Freedman, vice-chair of the Ontario Labour Relations Board, rarely misses a Sunday meeting. The 59-year-old labour lawyer has lost 171 pounds since rejoining the program just over two years ago.

In 1986, he weighed 240 pounds, and dropped 60 pounds on the program. "I stayed with Harvey for a couple years. Then I thought I was smart enough to do it my own," he says.

Some 20 years later Freedman – he had ballooned to 407 pounds – went back to Brooker. "It worked for me the first time," he says, calling Brooker's nutrition plan "a lifestyle, not a diet. "There are certain things you avoid… I haven't had french fries in two years."

Freedman says he has become more conscious of portion control, but there's plenty of room for fruit and vegetables.

He also writes down everything he eats and does personal coaching with Brooker.

Freedman has also incorporated exercise into his life. "I'm at the gym most mornings. Exercise is integral to the program."

One of Freedman's most memorable weight loss milestones was being able to easily put on leather chaps, protective leg covering for riding a motorcycle. "I couldn't bend over at the waist to snap them and zip them up."

In the spring of 2008, seven months after starting the program, Freedman donned his bike chaps.

Selecting food has been a matter of making good choice, he muses. "I either can eat chicken wings and fries or wear those leather chaps. I can't do both."

Breast cancer survivors Run for the Cure

By MARNI BRINDER BYK
Special to The CJN

In October, the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation CIBC Run for the Cure held its 18th annual run involving more than 30,000 people affected by breast cancer through first-hand experience or through someone they know.

The first run was held in Toronto in 1992, and since then, the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation CIBC Run for the Cure has become Canada's largest single-day, volunteer-led, national event to raise money for breast cancer research, educational and awareness initiatives.

Two breast cancer survivors, Orly Porat and Susan Fine, have been participating in the run for several years with their friends and family.

Porat, who lives in Vaughan, Ont., went through surgery for breast cancer on March 31, 2003, at Women's College Hospital during the early days of SARS in Toronto.

"My husband was not allowed to accompany me," Porat says. "I had to face the prospect of SARS and surgery alone. I was very frightened but kept telling myself that I was a soldier and could handle this on my own."

Porat was born in Israel but lived in Venezuela for 14 years before immigrating to Canada. She was diagnosed with breast cancer in February 2003, and a month later, she had 14 lymph nodes removed and had a lumpectomy. Then she underwent a 12-week session of chemotherapy followed by radiation therapy.

Toronto's Susan Fine was diagnosed with breast cancer in 2000 after she noticed a lump while she was dressing. Fine was quickly treated with a lumpectomy and radiation. Five years later, her doctor found a lump in her other breast. The second cancer was much more aggressive, and as a result, she had a complete mastectomy and further chemotherapy treatments.

"I consider myself lucky that the Ontario government cleared the way for Herceptin to be made available for the treatment of breast cancer," she says.

She received Herceptin in 18 doses over the course of a year. Fine has been participating in the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation CIBC Run for the Cure ever since her diagnosis in 2000.

Porat began to participate in the run in 2008, once she had reached the five-year mark and felt confident in declaring herself "cancer-free." She is a member of Team Latino, a group of South American women (as well as a few husbands and her personal trainer) who have friends or family affected by breast cancer. Porat's friend, who lost a friend in South America to breast cancer, organized the group to participate in the run.

Porat also volunteers at Women's College Hospital in the recovery room. "I feel blessed that I have my health again, and by volunteering, I am able to reaffirm this message to myself and give back to those who are in need," she says.

In addition, she talks a lot to women about breast cancer and provides information on how they can reduce the risk. "I want to share my story with women and let them know that there is life after cancer. This is very important to me."

When discussing her own experience with her diagnosis she says, "There was no way I could lose my life."

Fine participates in the Toronto run with family members. Her daughter Rachel says that "it's a good reminder of the journey we have been through."

With the help of her friend Lou Dale and daughter Rachel, Fine also raises money by baking and selling frozen lemon tortes to her friends and family. Last year, she made 70 tortes for Passover and sold them for $50 each.

"Half of the money is donated to the run to help find a cure, and the other half covers the cost of the ingredients."

Fine works hard at fundraising for breast cancer research and believes it reminds the people around her family of everything they have been through. She says she "would really like to get across that I am a two-time breast cancer survivor" and that she found the support at the Toronto East General Hospital and at Holy Blossom Temple was amazing during her treatments.

To order Fine's frozen lemon tortes send an e-mail to lemontortes@gmail.com. To register as an individual or as a team for the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation CIBC Run for the Cure or to make a donation please visit www.cbcf.org.

Over 30,000 people took part in the 18th Run for the Cure.

Rabbi ready for Olympic adventure

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — It's not every day that you get invited to serve on the multifaith committee of the Olympics. When Rabbi Shmuel Birnham was asked to be the Jewish clergyman on that body last year, he jumped at the opportunity.

"I thought, 'How cool. What an adventure,'" he said. "I'm sure this is the only time in my life I'll get to do something like this."

The rabbi of Congregation Har El, a Conservative synagogue on the North Shore of Vancouver, Rabbi Birnham, 55, will spend time in the Olympic villages in Whistler and Vancouver. He will also be on call for Jewish athletes requiring spiritual or religious assistance during the 2010 Winter Olympics, which begin Feb. 12.

Over the past year, he's attended a series of meetings and exchanged a host of phone calls and e-mails in preparation for his Olympic duties, but even so, none of the clergy on the committee knows quite what to expect.

Federal agency in turmoil over Mideast funding

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Rights and Democracy, a Canadian government agency whose mandate is to promote democratic development and defend human rights around the world, has been plunged into turmoil after its new chair challenged funding to three Middle Eastern organizations that are highly critical of Israel.

Aurel Braun, chair of the Montreal-based agency and a University of Toronto professor, said two Palestinian groups, Al-Haq and Al Mezan, and an Israeli one, B'Tselem, should have been denied grants of $10,000 each that were disbursed last year.

Braun, appointed to his position by the Conservative government last March, about a month after the funds were allocated, charged Al-Haq and Al Mezan with being "toxic" organizations.

Al-Haq has links to terrorism, he said, while Al Mezan has demonized Israel. B'Tselem, he added, is blatantly partisan.

The three groups were asked in e-mail messages to respond to Braun's accusations, but they did not reply.

Braun added that such nongovernmental organizations should only be eligible for federal funds if they're non-partisan, impartial, have no ties to terrorism and don't offend Canadians.

Warren Allmand, a former Liberal federal cabinet minister and president of Rights and Democracy from 1997 to 2002, said in an interview last week he would have opposed in principle the funding of organizations associated with terrorism.

But to the best of his knowledge, based on his discussions with Al-Haq and Al Mezan officials in the Palestinian territories during his presidency, there is no evidence that either group has ties to terrorism.

The News in Brief

Canada

Haifa Gas Field Find

TORONTO — Canada's Bontan Oil and Gas Company said last week that it has found a reserve of up to six trillion cubic feet of natural gas off the coast of Israel. The gas could be worth up to $7.54 billion at current prices, the Israeli daily business newspaper Globes reported. The prospective resources in two gas fields, called Mira and Sarah, were found by the Toronto-based company off the Mediterranean coast close to Haifa, near the gas fields Tamar and Dalit, which were discovered last year.

'Weeks' To Find Body

MONTREAL — The painstaking removal of rubble from Port-au-Prince's Montana Hotel – thought to contain the remains of Haitian quake victim Alexandre Bitton, 36, of Montreal and other Canadians and victims – could take "weeks and weeks," Canadian Air Force Col. Scott Clancy was quoted as saying from Haiti last week. Rescue teams reportedly dug a 14-metre tunnel into the hotel as part of the salvage operation. Only 17 people reportedly survived the hotel's collapse, with 25 bodies recovered and scores still unaccounted for. Bitton, a computer technician and the only known Canadian-Jewish victim, was on a business trip when a massive earthquake struck Haiti Jan. 12. In all, 106 Canadians were still missing there as of last week.

World

GA Moves To N.O.

NEW YORK — The Jewish Federations of North America is moving its annual conference to New Orleans and holding it earlier than planned, from Nov. 7-9. The umbrella group of Jewish federations was set to hold its 2010 General Assembly in Orlando, Fla., but said it changed locations for practical reasons and because federations raised $30 million after Hurricane Katrina to help rebuild the area.

Hate Crimes Spike

PARIS — A rise in anti-Semitic crimes in France coinciding with the Gaza war nearly doubled the number of anti-Semitic incidents in 2009 over 2008, says a new report. The Jewish Community Protection Service counted 832 anti-Semitic acts in France in 2009, versus 474 the year before, according to a Feb. 4 report. However, 354 of those incidents were in January, during Israel's Gaza offensive. By February, the number was down to 62 and, by the summer of 2009, incidents dropped below those of 2008.

Mussolini App Nixed

ROME — A controversial new iPhone application featuring a collection of speeches of Italy's World War II fascist dictator Benito Mussolini has been withdrawn. The cancellation of Italy's bestselling iPhone application came Feb. 4 after legal threats and protests by Jewish groups. The film group Cinecitta Luce, which holds the rights to the films of the Mussolini speeches used in the iMussolini app, threatened legal action against its creator, saying the app didn't serve the educational purposes that the clips were designated for.

Survivor's Grandson Buys Mengele Diary

STAMFORD, Conn. — The diary of the notorious Josef Mengele has been sold.

The 180-page journal was sold for an undisclosed sum Feb. 2 "to an East Coast Jewish philanthropist who wishes to remain anonymous," the Hartford Courant reported Feb. 3, citing an e-mail from Bill Panagopulos of Alexander Autographs historical artifacts house in Stamford, Conn.

"He is the grandson of an Auschwitz survivor who personally encountered Mengele at Auschwitz," Panagopulos wrote. "He intends to donate the manuscript to a museum devoted to the Holocaust." He said he was "overjoyed that the manuscript is going where it belongs, where it will be available to historians and scholars."

On Feb. 1, it was reported that Alexander Autographs intended to auction off the journal. Nazi memorabilia collectors vying for the artifact belonging to the Nazi doctor known at Auschwitz as the "Angel of Death" were expected to push the price up to about $64,000.

The owner of the diary, reported to be a source close to the Mengele family, acquired the volume in Brazil after Mengele died there in 1979, the Daily Mail reported.

The diary begins in May 1960, when Mengele was 49.

At Auschwitz, Mengele determined who would live and die, and he conducted horrific, quasi-medical experiments, including on twins.

News of the auction prompted anger and revulsion among Shoah survivor groups.

Congress, United Church patch up differences

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish Congress and the United Church of Canada appear to have resolved their differences over the Church's links to a Jewish organization that's highly critical of Israel.

Congress and Church representatives met last week at the Lipa Green Building after Congress CEO Bernie Farber suggested the two organizations were close to schism.

Both sides emerged from the meeting pledging "to seek ways of promoting ongoing dialogue, to hear each other's concerns.

"We put our feelings on the table and held the tensions creatively. Both groups made a commitment to ongoing dialogue to deal with difficult issues and to look for ways to work in common cause," a joint news release stated.

The meeting had been requested by Congress to voice its concerns over the Church's relationship with Independent Jewish Voices (IJV), a small group that accuses Israel of apartheid and human rights violations.

Bernie Farber

The group had received a $900 grant from the Church and was involved in joint programs with Church regional bodies.

Farber said Congress was concerned over the Church's relationship with IJV and had requested a formal statement from the Church's senior national leadership dissociating it from the group. He described IJV as "a small rump group of people who engaged this debate in the [United Church] and motivated [anti-Israel] resolutions at the Church's General Council meeting in Kelowna [last summer]."

IJV states on its website that it "has come under attack by pro-Israel groups because we challenge their contention that they speak for Canadian Jews, as well as their unqualified support for Israeli behaviour even when it involves the violation of human rights and international law."

The Church statement, which appears on its website, "acknowledged its longstanding and historical relationship with Canadian Jewish Congress as the place for dialogue and consultation with the Jewish community of Canada. The UCC reiterated its position that Independent Jewish Voices has not been and is not a partner of the United Church of Canada.

"For its part, Canadian Jewish Congress acknowledged that the UCC by its very nature listens to many voices and many perspectives in Canada and beyond on all issues including its reflections on peace in the Middle East."

Farber said that "the meeting was cordial and focused. I think we all understand the need to reconcile for the sake of the faith communities. We both wanted it."

Nora Saunders, general secretary of the Church's General Council, said that "it was a good meeting and a reminder to us and everyone of the importance of sitting down and talking about things… I felt a renewed sense that there are things in common and things we disagreed with and we need to continue meeting."

Both groups are "rooted in faith, with some common roots. Through our different faiths, we're passionate about working for the good."

Benjamin's Lifecycle Financial Services
Through the generations ...a sacred trust

Together, we can keep the HST away from your bottom line.

When the Harmonized Sales Tax (HST) is introduced in the new year, funeral expenses will be taxed for the first time in provincial history. Overnight, the cost of a funeral will jump by 8% resulting in an additional $800-$1,200 in expenses.

Prearranging funerals has always made good sense. Peace of mind, the ability to plan just how you want to be remembered, and freezing the cost in today's dollars are a few of the treasured benefits. Now there's one more reason to prearrange: significant tax savings.

The HST deadline is fast approaching. By acting now, you can keep that legacy for your loved ones.

Call Benjamin's Lifecycle Financial today to beat the tax and lock in the savings for your future.

Hebrew U's 85th anniversary

Some seven years after the foundation stone was laid in 1918, the Hebrew University in Jerusalem officially opened on April 1, 1925.

The renowned artist Leopold Pilichowski captured the ceremony, the significance and the magnificent magic of the university's inauguration on a large 3.5 x 2-metre oil canvas.

Against the beige and brown hills of Judea, the mountains of Moab, the Jordan Valley and the shimmering blue of the northern lip of the Dead Sea, Pilichowski paints hundreds of people (of the thousands who were at the ceremony) sitting and standing, encircling a large dais on Mount Scopus. They are clearly in rapt attention, listening to a white-haired man of senior years delivering an oration of apparent import.

The speaker is British foreign secretary Lord Arthur James Balfour, the author of the Balfour Declaration. Seated behind him in the first row of a five-row gallery of scholars, dignitaries and representatives of foreign governments are Chaim Nachman Bialik; Achad Ha'am; Chief Sephardi Rabbi Jacob Meir; Chief Ashkenazi Rabbi Abraham Isaac Hacohen Kook; Lord General Edmund Henry Allenby, the British commander who defeated the Turkish army in 1918; Sir Herbert Louis Samuel, the first high commissioner of Palestine; and Chaim Weizmann.

It is very clearly an important assembly on an equally important occasion. Beyond any doubt, that sunblazed ceremony on that spring day in 1925 on the eastern slope of Mount Scopus, merely one week before the start of the festival of freedom, was a watershed moment in the course of establishing a sovereign Jewish state, in the course of modern Jewish history and, it is not an exaggeration to add, in the course of modern world history.

From the editor's desk...

To commemorate the 85th anniversary of that milestone moment on Mount Scopus, The CJN was invited by the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University to travel to Jerusalem, visit the university and meet and engage with some of its scholars, researchers and teachers.

Our first visit was with Menahem Ben-Sasson, the president of the university.

Ben-Sasson is an internationally recognized scholar of Jewish history. The author of some 40 books and articles, he has won numerous distinctions and honours for his work and taught in many prestigious institutions.

He is soft-spoken of manner, precise of thought and often poetic in expression.

The decision to found the Hebrew University "was itself a breakthrough in Jewish thinking," Ben-Sasson emphasized.

"'How shall we build a Jewish state?' the visionaries asked themselves." But it was actually the very asking of this question and the determination to act upon it, Ben-Sasson pointed out, that laid the real cornerstone of the university.

Menahem Ben-Sasson

"The mission that emerged from the foundational question," Ben-Sasson emphatically said, "was a twofold one: we will be committed to the building of a state and to the betterment of the world."

To ensure that we understand the significance of the twofold commitment of the university, Ben-Sasson elaborated in nearly rabbinic rhapsody.

"The ceremony at the amphitheatre [an amphitheatre exists today at the spot on Mount Scopus where the ceremony took place] symbolized the duality of this mission," he said. "Facing the desert, we face the open vista, the open spaces. We face the future. You can build upon it what you consider important.

"Facing the Old City [below the western slopes of Mount Scopus], by contrast, we face the past and the present. We must build upon it too. Like then, the university sees itself taking from the past and feeding the future."

Gently yet excitedly, as if unwrapping a gift, the president of the university seemed to be almost personally recollecting events as he described the atmosphere, the anticipation, the excitement at the makeshift wooden stage on Mount Scopus 85 years earlier.

"There was a messianic feeling to the ceremony," he said. "Jews had been the subject of quotas and suffered discrimination throughout Europe. Now they had a university of their own. The first programs at Hebrew University were Jewish studies, mathematics and biochemistry."

Ben-Sasson emphasized that the mission of the university today is the same as it was when it opened 85 years ago.

"Our mission is service to the Jewish People and service to the world."

Over the next few weeks, I shall write about some of the ways in which the men and women of Hebrew University apply their knowledge, curiosity, skill and resolve in fulfilment of the twofold mission that was and remains the cornerstone of the university.

York security called to Hasbara event

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Campus security was called to a pro-Israel event last week at York University after a crowd of students surrounded a Hasbara information table and two students were allegedly slapped.

Hasbara Fellowships, a Jewish group on campus, was running a campaign with permission from the university to raise awareness about Hamas and Gilad Schalit, a kidnapped Israeli soldier, when several students began arguing with the information booth's organizers about the legitimacy of their campaign, called Hamas: the Obstacle to Peace.

According to Tyler Golden, Hasbara's co-president, who was at the Feb. 1 event, two Hasbara members took out cameras as the argument escalated, and were hit while students tried to get away from the cameras.

He said two Jewish students were slapped, one on the arm and the other across the face.

"About 50 or so anti-Israel students surrounded us and started asking questions and it led to a heated debate," Golden said, adding that he had been told by York administration to film any anti-Semitic incidents that might occur.

"Anti-Israel slurs were shouted to the point where two Jewish students brought out cameras... it resulted in two Jewish students being slapped."

Golden said that some of these slurs included phrases like: "Go back to where you came from" and "You're from an apartheid state."

Marlee Mozeson, co-president of Hasbara, was one of the students who took out a camera during the incident.

"First a girl approached me and started asking me questions. After awhile, she started to become very hostile... I had my camera out to take pictures and videos," she said. "I guess she didn't want me to have her on camera. She slapped me on my arm and slapped the camera out of my hand.

"Four or five of us called security, because obviously we were exceptionally nervous."

Two university security officers arrived on the scene. Students were asked by security if they wanted to involve the police, but declined.

Toronto police were not called "because we wanted to give the university a chance to put its system into place," Golden told JTA.

He said a complaint was lodged with York's Student Conduct and Dispute Resolution Office.

After reviewing security tapes, the university also chose not to involve the police in terms of a possible assault, but did refer the case to the Toronto Police hate crimes unit, said Alex Bilyk, York's director of media relations.

The university has appointed an adjudicator in the wake of the incident, Bilyk said.

He added that about 30 students were involved in the incident in total and that he wasn't aware of receiving any video from Hasbara.

"There were allegations made about some slurs... since we don't have audio [from the security tape], obviously we turned it over [to the police]," he said, explaining that the university has started its own investigation under the code of student conduct.

Det. Gary McQueen of the Toronto Police Service hate crimes unit said the incident was investigated and no charges will be laid. He added that police will be meeting with students and the administration to talk about how to handle similar incidents.

"There will be further consultation with the stakeholders [about] strategies on how to better handle controversial situations," he said.

Jennifer Diamond, assistant director of Israel affairs at Hillel of Greater Toronto, thinks Hasbara's campaign is legitimate.

"The material that Jewish students were presenting revealed that Hamas is an acknowledged terrorist organization which has imposed oppressive rule on the people of Gaza," she said.

"That anti-Israel students chose to aggressively confront Jewish students is unacceptable and fuels a toxic environment on campus."

In response to the incident, the university posted a statement on its website that said "York deplores any comments and actions that are racist or anti-Semitic in nature."

Hasbara also put out a press release last week commending York University for its "swift investigation into the violent incident... Hasbara Fellowships at York University is confident that after... the implementation of new codes and practices on campus, [the] investigation will lead to quick action against the perpetrators."

Mozeson said Hasbara continued with its campaign all last week.

"We've had a few people coming up to the table and arguing with us, but it's been relatively quiet," she said.

"I think this is just an opportunity for the university to open up a new chapter [for] a safe environment, a place where Jewish students do not feel that they have to hide what they believe in."

A year ago, a group of Jewish students at York were barricaded in the Hillel lounge by a mob yelling anti-Semitic and anti-Israel slurs. Police had to escort the Jewish students out of the building. Two York students, including a member of the student council, were reprimanded for the incident.

In response to that and other incidents involving Jewish students, York established a task force. Among its recommendations were the creation of more student space for studying and socializing, and the expansion of the Student Code of Conduct.

Ban on UN bullying is not very likely

In accordance with the endorsement last November by the UN General Assembly of the findings of the Goldstone Commission Inquiry into Israel's recent war with Hamas, Secretary General Ban Ki-moon delivered a report to the General Assembly last week, saying Israel had responded to all the accusations against it.

Ban's report was 72 pages long. Of those pages, 46 pages comprised Israel's updated investigation into the war, which outlined the steps Israel has taken thus far to investigate the allegations made against the Israel Defence Forces. That 46-page report was in addition to Israel's first official response, in July 2009, to the Goldstone report.

Of the remaining 26 pages in the Secretary General's report, some pages or perhaps paragraphs (we know not which or how many) were the response from the Palestinian Authority reiterating its "firm… rejection of any equating of the military aggression of and crimes committed by Israel, the occupying power, against the Palestinian people with actions that may have been committed by the Palestinian side." No one seems to have pointed out to the PA that Israel left the Gaza Strip in 2005, that the only occupying power in Gaza are the radically Islamist leaders of Hamas, who are considered terrorists by many western governments, including Canada and the United States.

Hamas, it must be pointed out, did not submit a response. It purported to apologize last week for civilian casualties from its relentless rocketing of civilians in the Negev. But it clarified matters this week by rescinding that purported apology.

The status of the Goldstone report is still hazy, but a steep, harrowing precipice may be looming at the other end of the fog.

Jerusalem was pleased with Ban's report to the General Assembly, despite the fact – or perhaps because of the fact – that Ban offered no comment upon the merits of Israel's response. "Israel expresses satisfaction that the UN Secretary General's report to the General Assembly reflected accurately the Israeli document that was submitted [last] week," a foreign ministry spokesperson said.

Ban will not likely ask the Security Council to take further action on the Goldstone recommendations. Moreover, the Security Council would not likely direct that any further action be taken. That cannot be said, however, for the president of the General Assembly, Ali Abdusalam Treki, of Libya. He has suggested that the Goldstone report findings be moved forward. It is very likely that he will direct the convening of a special session of the General Assembly to once again discuss and debate the findings in the report.

Even before the first delegate stands to speak, we can all predict the outcome of the discussion: the General Assembly will refer the matter to the International Criminal Court.

If that debate does arise, the nations of the West must stand at Israel's side for far more than merely calling a halt to the UN's bullying of the Jewish state is at stake. What will hang in the balance is the very right and the ability of the West to defend itself against terrorism.

Minority decides who makes a good Jew

After reading "Return conversion to local rabbis" (Perspectives, Jan. 14), I am beginning to wonder, why today, 70 years after the most catastrophic and darkest period in the history of the Jewish People, we the Jews who have survived, and flourished, seem not to understand that we must stand together to face the future.

Being a child of survivors and a grandmother of four, I find it very difficult to fathom why we must segregate ourselves into the categories haredi, Orthodox, modern Orthodox, Reform, Conservative, secular, etc. During the Holocaust, we were all Jews, period. Unless we begin to accept one another's differences as Jews, we will again be vulnerable to future persecutions.

What qualifies the haredi community to say who should or shouldn't become a Jew? If qualified rabbis cannot make the decision as to who would make a good Jewish convert, then we have an enormous problem on our hands. One small section of the Jewish community should not be given the powers to decide on behalf of the larger community what legitimate and traditional Torah views should be. In today's world, we as a Jewish nation need people who want to embrace Judaism and stand proudly beside their fellow Jews, and the Land of Israel. They should be welcomed into the fold.

Ruth's conversion not valid today

According to the Tanach, 3,000 years ago, Ruth the Moabite, a gentile, married the Jewish son of Naomi ("Rabbi warns of conversion 'catastrophe,' Feb. 4). When subsequently her husband died and her mother-in-law urged her to return to her people, Ruth uttered the famous words: "Do not urge me to leave you, or to turn back and not follow you. For wherever you go, I will go; wherever you lodge, I will lodge; your people shall be my people, and your God my God." Based solely on these words, Naomi, a woman, accepted Ruth's conversion to Judaism. As we know, Ruth went on to marry Boaz. The Almighty blessed this union, and Ruth became the great-grandmother of none other than King David.

Had these events taken place today, Ruth's speedy conversion by Naomi would have been derisively dismissed by our rabbis, haredi or otherwise. The implication, of course, is that neither King David nor the coming of the Mashiach would now be part of our sacred faith. Where have our traditions, the teachings of our sage Hillel gone? What has happened to our compassionate and welcoming nature?

Israeli Arabs are our people, too

Let us remember that the application of rights is not defined by religion or culture ("Funding of services for Israeli Arabs," letters, Jan. 21). In a democracy, all citizens should be regarded and treated as equals. As a Canadian minority we would accept no less. Israeli citizens, Arab or Jew, should expect no less.

My concern for our people – and remember that Arab citizens of Israel are also our people and that West Bank residents under de facto Israeli control are, from a rights point of view, also our people – is that these rights are often denied or absent. It's possible to balance security and humanity. It is a dictate of Judaism and at the core of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Cotler deserves Nobel Peace Prize

Bravo to Gil Troy for planning to nominate Liberal MP Irwin Cotler for the Nobel Peace Prize ("Tory attacks on Cotler must stop," Jan. 14). No one has done more to bring justice and peace to the world than Cotler. Although Troy outlines some of Cotler's accomplishments, an entire book could easily be written on Cotler's active and ongoing involvement in promoting peace and justice at home and abroad.

Cotler has been referred to as "counsel for the oppressed" (by Maclean's magazine), he has received eight honorary doctorates and he has received the Order of Canada, along with many humanitarian awards.

Regarding Tory attacks on Cotler, could it be that some Tories are willing to go to any measures to discredit Cotler because they know that he is a formidable opponent?

Having interviewed Cotler in 2008 and learned about this honourable mensch, I stand behind Troy and all peace-loving citizens, no matter their race or religion, to support the nomination of Cotler for the Nobel Peace Prize.

Israel responds to Goldstone with diplomacy

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

The Goldstone wars continue, but beneath the shouting a diplomatic track has emerged.

The Israeli government last week published a reply to the UN Human Rights Council's report on the conduct of last winter's Gaza war with Hamas, insisting that Israel Defence Forces investigations into possible Israeli wrongdoing in Gaza were not principally motivated by last autumn's UN report.

Nonetheless, the reply repeatedly refers to the UN report – known as the Goldstone report for its principal author, retired South African judge Richard Goldstone – and was delivered within the six-month deadline that Goldstone recommended to avoid international prosecution.

Moreover, the bulk of Israel's reply is dedicated to establishing the independence of military investigators and prosecutors, which would satisfy Goldstone's requirement that any investigation should not be a matter of the alleged perpetrators investigating themselves.

The Israeli document notes that two senior IDF officers were disciplined for firing rocket shells into a populated area of Gaza where the field office of the UN Relief and Works Agency, the principal group administering relief to Palestinian refugees, was situated.

More striking is the conciliatory tone taken by the Israeli government toward Goldstone and the human rights groups from which he drew in writing his report – acknowledging that Goldstone and the groups played a critical role in helping the IDF examine its actions.

An Israeli army spokesperson said that while the army relied primarily on its own resources to identify deviations from policy, the human rights groups helped spur along the process.

"We take a look at ourselves and where we were right and where mistakes were made," Capt. Barak Raz told JTA. "It's important that a commander can go home at the end of the operation and look his family in the eye, and that the soldiers 20 years from now can look in their children's eyes."

Richard Goldstone

Nonetheless, he added, "I can't deny that these reports also contributed to our ability to be made aware."

The civil tone does not mean the rhetorical wars engendered by Goldstone, a human rights icon with a pro-Israel history, are over. Top Israeli officials, up to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, continue to cast the report as inimical to Israel's interests as Iran and its putative nuclear weapons program.

Non-governmental defenders of Israel continue to demonize Goldstone. Most recently, Alan Dershowitz likened him to a "moser," a Jewish traitor deemed in some interpretations as worthy of a death sentence.

In the meantime, left-wing and pro-Palestinian groups continue to call for war crimes investigations of Israel and have inhibited travel by Israeli officials to Europe lest they face arrest warrants.

Against the noise, the government's description of the Israeli army's co-operation with the same groups was telling.

Noting that 150 separate investigations arose from Operation Cast Lead, Israel's name for the Gaza War, the government reply says that a portion were initiated by the army and "others were opened in response to complaints and reports from Palestinian civilians, local and international non-governmental organizations, and UN and media reports."

IDF forces during ground manoeuvres in the Gaza Strip last year. [Matan Hakimi, IDF Spokesperson]

Of the 150 probes, 36 have resulted in criminal prosecutions – 19 of these involved shooting toward civilians, and 17 involved using civilians as human shields, mistreating detainees and theft.

Between 1,000 and 1,500 Palestinians died in the war. Human rights groups say the majority were civilians, while Israel says the majority were fighters.

Israel launched the operation after Hamas stepped up its rocket attacks on southern Israel. Such attacks had been an almost daily occurrence since the terrorist group took over the strip in 2007, and dated back more than eight years.

Of the 34 incidents outlined in the Goldstone report, the Israeli government says the army was investigating 22 before the report was published – it admits that Goldstone's research led to the other 12 inquiries. (The two officers reprimanded for shelling the UNRWA compound are not among them.)

Additionally, the government reply says, the Military Police Criminal Investigation Division "has sought assistance from non-governmental organizations (such as B'Tselem) to help locate Palestinian complainants and witnesses, and to co-ordinate their arrival at the Erez crossing point to Gaza, to allow interviews and questioning."

B'Tselem is an Israeli human rights group concerned with the mistreatment of Palestinians.

The approach is welcome, said Michael Sfard, the legal counsel for three groups – Yesh Din, Peace Now and Breaking the Silence – that have been targeted by right-wingers and some Israel defenders as antagonistic toward Israel's interests.

"It's the first time since Cast Lead that a government body has done something that is purely professional, and this is how it should have been handled," Sfard said.

Goldstone declined a request from JTA for an interview.

Despite its conciliatory tone, the government's reply said the report reflects "many misunderstandings and fundamental mistakes with regard to the Gaza Operation, its purposes, and Israel's legal system."

A researcher for Human Rights Watch, one of the groups that Goldstone drew upon in compiling his report, said the army investigations, while welcome, focused more on the foot soldiers than on orders that might have been illegal.

"We're concerned that low-level grunts are being investigated for violating orders when in fact the orders themselves may have been illegal," researcher Fred Abrahams said. "We don't have faith in the military's willingness to investigate itself."

Sfard agreed, saying he trusted the integrity of the military prosecutors in dealing with the military establishment, but wondered whether the prosecutors were willing to indict their own commanders.

He noted, for instance, that the report said prosecutors cleared Israel of wrongdoing in the use of white phosphorus while acknowledging the use of the chemical during the war. Army commanders likely would have sought the military advocate general's opinion before using the phosphorous, which burns skin on contact but may also be used to identify targets in areas where there are no civilians.

That puts prosecutors in the unenviable position of saying their commander sanctioned an illegal order.

Moreover, Sfard said, as independent as he believes the military prosecutors are, he doubts that they would take on the military chief of staff himself, Lt.-Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi, who formulated much of the policy.

"If the chief of staff has approved an attack, it is very difficult to expect that the military police and prosecution would deal with that," he said.

Sfard said there was still a need for an independent Israeli commission to investigate the conduct of the war.

Anne Herzberg, the legal adviser for NGO Monitor, a group that tracks the funding and alleged biases of human rights groups, said she believed Israel may yet set up such a commission – but not because of pressures from human rights groups such as the ones Sfard represents.

"If they feel there's room for that and there's enough support, they should do it for internal purposes and because the Israeli public demands it," she said, "not for a certain fringe sector of Israeli society making a lot of noise."

Opinions

Everyday angels

What is an angel? In Jewish thought, the existence of angels is both universally accepted and the subject of controversy. Are they independent beings or manifestations of God? Can they choose their actions and perhaps even sin? The precise nature of angels is vague, a topic that is debated and debatable.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Even the Hebrew word for angel is ambiguous: "malach" literally means "messenger," and this word can refer both to someone bringing a package by bicycle from one office to another, or the winged spirit carrying a message from God to man. This ambiguity is no coincidence. The Torah chose to leave the identity of angels murky, to impart an important lesson. The Torah wants us to shift our gaze and instead of searching for winged angels above, open our eyes to the everyday angels below.

To see "everyday angels," we must appreciate the fact that God has many messengers, and sometimes the message is for us. In everyday life, everyday angels appear on a divine mission to encourage us, protect us and even wrestle with us.

Sometimes, even rationalists like me feel the presence of angels. My wife, Lisa, and I struggled to have children into the third year of our marriage. One Friday night, after a long week, we chose to have dinner at home alone. During Kiddush, we heard a knock on the door. Outside was a young chassidic man with his very pregnant wife. They had gotten stuck in traffic, and had to get off the highway before Shabbat began. After finding their way to the local Reform synagogue, they got directions to our home more than a mile away.

We hadn't prepared for guests, but we happily shared our home with our unexpected visitors. Lisa and I felt that taking in unexpected guests was our special obligation. After all, that Shabbat was the parshah in which Abraham and Sarah show exceptional hospitality to three strangers.

It turns out that the three strangers who visit Abraham and Sarah are actually angels. It also turns out that the angels are coming to tell the old couple that they will finally have a child.

Abraham and Sarah have a son one year later. And, as it turns out, after inviting in unexpected, pregnant guests, Lisa and I had twin boys 10 months later.

The young husband and wife weren't angels, but there's no doubt in our minds that they were malachim, messengers from God. They arrived with the message that it's important not just to fill our homes with children, but also to open our homes to guests.

They were everyday angels carrying an extraordinary message.

Are we ready for Anti-Israel Week?

Like clockwork – or a recurring infection – Anti-Israel Week is returning to a campus near you.

One Israel-bashing website declares: "Mark your calendars – the 6th International Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) will take place across the globe from from the 1st to the 14th of March 2010!" Note the duplicated "from" reflecting the organizers' sloppiness. Note the organizers' lack of awareness that a "week" is usually seven days, not 14. Their knowledge of history and their moral sensibilities are equally wanting, although that doesn't stop them from becoming popular on many campuses.

Gil Troy in Montreal

In fact, of the 40 "cities" they claim as participants, 12 are Canadian, and many of those are actually just Canadian campuses. Still, the website indicates that Israel's enemies are planning an elaborate assault on Israel's legitimacy, just weeks from now. Are we in the Jewish community ready? Is our university leadership ready?

Pro-Israel activists need an action plan, and so do university leaders. Recently, when a series of academic administrators testified before the Canadian Parliamentary Inquiry into Antisemitism, most were so busy reassuring concerned legislators that all is well that they failed to acknowledge the trouble and dilemmas they face.

Of course, Canadian campuses aren't hotbeds of anti-Semitism, but that doesn't mean the scourge of anti-Jewish animus isn't motivating and shaping many political attacks on Israel.

Administrators need to prepare carefully for Anti-Israel Week (repeating the actual name echoes the lie). They should keep five guidelines in mind:

First, academic freedom protects all students, enabling them to express a range of opinions on campus.

Second, civility is also a value on campus and must be nurtured. Professors and administrators should take advantage of teachable moments to foster a culture of civility and mutuality.

Third, no student should ever feel menaced or threatened. Hooliganish behaviour, even if politically motivated, should be punished harshly – and swiftly.

Fourth, Jews don't need special treatment but deserve equal treatment. If there's a no-criticism zone on campus around gays, women, blacks and Third Worlders, it should extend to Jews, too. If there's a special attempt to be sensitive to particular groups that have been oppressed historically, Jews merit that sensitivity, too. Moreover, many of the groups trying to ostracize or delegitimize Israel are perpetuating traditional anti-Jewish tropes, accusing Jews and Israel of being at the centre of the world's troubles, of being all-powerful, or of being devious and manipulative. These libels don't pass historical smell tests.

Finally, leadership is about turning potentially destructive moments into constructive moments. Campus leaders – administrators, professors, and, yes, students – need to be proactive pre-emptive and creative in seeing the great opportunity here to turn a week or two of tension into a time of engagement and bridge-building, or at least a truce.

The pro-Israel community should also have some guidelines, including:

First, firefighters need to extinguish fires not stoke them. Sometimes anti-Israel activities are best ignored.

Second, your goal is not to convince anti-Israel activists of anything. Your target audience is other Jews and the vast majority of non-combatants.

Third, don't let haters set the agenda. Far better to celebrate Israel than to get defensive.

Fourth, speak the language of campus on campus. Note that Arab autocracies are anti-democratic; apartheid doesn't apply to a national conflict between two peoples, both of whom have blacks and whites as members; blacklists and boycotts are illiberal and close-minded; many of the attacks on Israel are wildly inaccurate; Palestinians help legitimate terror as a tactic, and that life is more complex than the simplistic sloganeering of Anti-Israel Week.

Finally, do your homework and, like good Scouts, be prepared. Read Alan Dershowitz's devastating critique of the Goldstone report. Use a timeline and maps. Understand the background of the Gaza disengagement and the Oslo accords, which both resulted in massive violence against Israel after concessions, and, most important of all, understand why Jews are a nation, not just a religion, why we need a homeland, and why we have a valid historical, ideological, legal, political and living claim to Israel.

Channelling my inner Israeli Scarlett

Remember the scene in Gone With the Wind where Scarlett O'Hara scoops up a handful of earth and intones emotionally, "Oh, Tara!"? I was always taken with her love of that little piece of land, the actual earth itself, but I never quite understood it. I was a New York Jew whose only experience with earth was Central Park, and although I certainly loved the park, I couldn't picture kissing the ground. And what real earth that wasn't covered with cement could I attach myself to in my urban landscape?

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein in Jerusalem

Here in Israel, Tu b'Shvat has just passed, and as I mentioned in last month's column, it was indeed met with great fanfare. It's not a religious holiday, but a natural one, connected to trees (and forever in my mind to JNF) and celebrated with much gusto here. It's a holiday that all Israelis seem to share, revelling in eating dates, figs and seven species cakes, planting trees, and going to forests and parks to see the red cover of poppies now sprouting all over.

Many of us held Tu b'Shvat seders, complete with four cups of wine and all sorts of metaphors. But something still didn't fit for me. Suddenly Tu b'Shvat was real: the almond trees really were in blossom, the sun really was shining, and the birds from every rooftop really were chirping. I was singing a song that wasn't a longing and wasn't a lie. I'm used to saying, "Well, even though the ground is frozen, and the trees are dead and bare, it's Tu b'Shvat over there."

I've discovered a new attachment to land. I don't mean that in a physical way at all. It's not about this piece of territory or that one. I mean it in a spiritual way. Suddenly I'm eating local, and that means mangoes and avocados. Suddenly I'm eating seasonal, and I notice that strawberries are only available for three weeks and you can't get them whenever you want. (The other day I noticed a sign in the market, "First pecans of the season." Pecans have a season?)

You take hikes up mountains and field trips in wadis, and you notice where there is limestone and where there is basalt. You hope for rain. You pay attention to the water levels in the Kinneret, and you don't take long showers. Israelis know where and when the last trees were planted. They identify birds by name and don't think that's nerdy.

While I'm very proud of Canada and especially of Toronto, and I would show it with pleasure to any tourist, I think that after pointing out the first maple tree, I'd be done identifying species. Suddenly, although I live in a big city, I don't feel so urban anymore. It's all "Tara."

But Israel still has so far to go in protecting her. The ecological movement here is in its infancy, and many Israelis can't be bothered. Like women's issues a decade ago being put on the back burner because of security issues, the "green revolution" hasn't quite arrived here, and those who take it seriously are seen as somewhat kooky.

Junk food is normative eating for many Israeli kids, in between the occasional Tu b'Shvat fruit tray. You have to look hard for non-polluting cleaning products. The merchant in the market looks at me funny if I don't want at least two plastic bags. Recycling efforts are puny, and Jerusalem is dirty with litter. Piles of rubbish line the highway, and it's nearly impossible to bike instead of drive in a city of hills with no bike lanes anywhere. So it's an odd mixture of pride and negligence, of knowledge and ignorance. The almond tree may be in blossom, but it's soon going to be choked with smog if Israel doesn't pay attention to facts as much as to figs.

The Kirshner File

The collector

Eleazar Birnbaum officially retired as a University of Toronto professor in 1995, after reaching the mandatory retirement age of 65. But 15 years on, Birnbaum, an Orthodox Jew in a sea of secular academics, is still working as diligently as ever. For several years after stepping down, he continued teaching graduate students. Nowadays, the bookish Birnbaum, an expert in Turkish language and literature and the history of the Ottoman Empire, can be found two or three times a week in a small book-lined office in the university's department of Near and Middle Eastern civilizations, cataloguing his prized collection of manuscripts and supervising one lone PhD student.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The department was formed in 1996, following the amalgamation of the separate departments of Near Eastern studies and Middle East and Islamic studies. It offers courses in modern and ancient languages – including Akkadian, Aramaic, Arabic, Persian, Hebrew and Turkish – and in a host of subjects: religion, archeology, history, literature, philosophy, architecture and art.

Birnbaum, whose father is credited with establishing the authenticity of the Dead Sea Scrolls, arrived in Toronto in 1964 by way of Germany, Britain and the United States.

Born in Hamburg in 1929, the third of four children, he was the son of Solomon and Irene Birnbaum, a couple who exerted immense influence on him.

A master of languages, Solomon (1891-1989) held the world's first chair in Yiddish, at the University of Hamburg, from 1922 until 1933. He and his family left Germany after his life was threatened by the Nazis. They immigrated to Britain, Irene's birthplace. A scholar in her own right, Irene graduated from the University of London with a degree in English literature and was fluent in three languages.

From 1936 to 1957, Solomon was a lecturer in Hebrew paleography (the study of ancient handwriting and the practice of deciphering historical manuscripts) and epigraphy (the study of inscriptions) at the University of London's School of Oriental and African Studies.

Starting in 1938, he taught Yiddish at the University of London's School of Slavonic and East European Studies. After the outbreak of World War II, he was seconded to the British government's postal censorship office.

Upon receiving photographs of portions of the newly discovered Dead Sea Scrolls, he dated them immediately, passing on his expertise to his son, who now describes himself as a "detective" and "literary sleuth."

Solomon's extensive library whetted Eleazar's interest in languages. So much so that, at the age of 12, he prevailed upon his father to teach him the Arabic alphabet.

Having finished high school, he had to decide what to study at university. "I thought I'd be a doctor and save lives," he said. "But I was much too absent-minded for that."

Nor, as he put it, did he aspire to be "the millionth student" dissecting the works of William Shakespeare.

Enrolling at the School of Oriental and African Studies in 1947, he earned a BA degree in Arabic and Islamic history, a second degree in Turkish and Persian and Central Asian studies, and a diploma in Hebrew paleography and epigraphy.

Among his instructors were Bernard Lewis, the historian, and his father, who taught him the essentials of dating manuscripts in his course on Hebrew paleography. As he immersed himself in these fields, Birnbaum began buying Islamic and Hebrew manuscripts, frequenting Oriental bookshops.

Realizing that his knowledge of the Middle East was incomplete without Turkish, the lingua franca of the Ottoman Empire, he took a crash course in it. But much to his disappointment, he learned that all six university-level positions in that field were already taken.

Flinching at the prospect of being a financial burden on his parents, he accepted a poorly paid job in the mid-1950s as a clerk at the University of Durham's newly created Oriental library. "I lived on almost nothing," he said in a reference to his meagre salary.

Nonetheless, due to his facility with Middle Eastern languages and his ability as a cataloguer and bibliographer, he built a reputable research library at Durham. In his spare time, he studied library science and continued studying Ottoman Turkish texts.

From 1960 to 1964, he worked as a bibliographer at the University of Michigan's library, having been hired by one of Bernard Lewis' former students, a professor in Michigan's Middle East studies department. He was tasked with bolstering its collection of Arabic, Persian and Turkish texts. Birnbaum proceeded to streamline the library's method of ordering, cataloguing and classifying books.

As he acknowledges, the prospect of finding a suitable marriage partner was one of his ulterior motives for leaving Britain. He had made up his mind that she would have to be both Orthodox and well educated.

He met Rebecca (Rivka) Pardes, a Belgian Holocaust survivor, at a lecture at Columbia University in 1961. They were married in 1962. The Birnbaums sired five children, and now have 23 grandchildren.

A year later, a professor at the University of Toronto specializing in Islamic studies asked Birnbaum to assess the holdings of its Middle East library and make recommendations for expanding it. After submitting a report, he was offered a position as an associate professor of Turkish, on condition that he would train the university's librarians.

He was apparently the first Jew in decades to join the department. Under his stewardship, the University of Toronto's Ottoman/Turkish library evolved into a first-class institution, on a par with Harvard University.

Promoted to full professor in 1970, he taught courses in Turkish language and literature and Islamic bibliography. The very picture of a traditional observant Jew, Birnbaum never had any problems with his Muslim colleagues, having resolved long ago not to discuss politics, a volatile topic.

For many years, he travelled to fairly exotic destinations, notably Turkey, Morocco, Iran and Egypt, in search of Islamic and Hebrew manuscripts to augment his burgeoning personal collection, and often struck gold. "I'm the beneficiary of other people's ignorance," he observed, saying that vendors rarely really knew the value of the manuscripts they sold.

As his collection multiplied, he honed his skills as an authority in watermarks and inscriptions and poured his prodigious knowledge into a torrent of scholarly articles. Birnbaum, who has neither an MA nor a PhD, said, "The articles and scholarly studies I published, and the papers I presented at academic conferences, were considered to be at least equivalent to a doctorate dissertation."

Since 1954, Birnbaum has amassed nearly 300 Turkish, Arabic, Persian and Hebrew leather-bound manuscripts, which span an era from the ninth to the 19th century.

For my edification, he displayed four of his most valued manuscripts. The first one, an extremely rare piece adorned with gold leaf and inscribed by the 19th-century Turkish governor of Alexandria, brims with the verse of Nefi (1572-1635), one of the greatest Ottoman poets. The second one, written in Turkish, was produced in the 16th century and focuses on the power struggle between the two feuding sons of Suleiman the Magnificent, a reformist Ottoman sultan who expanded the empire.

The third manuscript, commissioned by Suleiman the Magnificent during roughly the same period, is in Persian and documents the line of Ottoman dynasties. The fourth one, written in a dialect known as Jewish Persian, is from the mid-19th century and features a selection of biblical psalms.

Asked what his beloved manuscripts are worth, he chuckled, saying, "Big money." Yet he has no plans to sell them. Instead, he hopes to publish them in book form one day soon.

Synagogue's new name pays tribute to Aish rabbi

By JENNIFER MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

Almost every Jew has a Hebrew name and so does almost every synagogue.

But up until recently, Toronto's Village Shul was the exception. At a gala event on Jan. 25, it received its Hebrew name, Kehillat Mishkan Noach.

The shul has been at its current location on Eglinton Avenue West for more than 10 years.

The name was chosen for Rabbi Noach Weinberg, founder of Aish International, with which the Village Shul is affiliated, on the first anniversary of Rabbi Weinberg's death.

Speakers paid tribute to Rabbi Weinberg and offered his life of humility and dedication as an inspiration for the classes and programs at the synagogue over almost 20 years, as well as for the shul's future.

"Boy, do I miss Rabbi Noach," the Village Shul's Rabbi Ahron Hoch said in a brief talk. Yet he urged the congregation to use the first yahrzeit of this beloved leader to absorb a lesson in leadership and getting involved in the broader Jewish community.

Village Shul becomes Kehillat Mishkan Noach

"As the congregation of the sanctuary of Noah [a literal translation of the new name]," he said, "we can change the world."

Changing the world – in small and large ways – was the topic of keynote speaker Rabbi Yaakov Salomon. So many of us avoid taking on leadership roles, thinking there's little we can do, said Rabbi Salomon, a Brooklyn psychotherapist who co-authored with Rabbi Weinberg the book, What the Angel Taught You: Seven Keys to Life Fulfillment. "Rabbi Weinberg would say you can do a lot."

An incident on a plane brought home the truth of this for Rabbi Salomon when he fell asleep briefly and his kippah fell off. After a frantic search, he spotted it in an unlikely location: on the face of the woman stretched out, asleep, across the seats behind him. Attempting to retain some dignity while reaching stealthily for the kippah, he suddenly realized she was wearing a sleep mask.

He found the real kippah wedged in the seat. The lesson? "Don't let your kippah become a blindfold."

A humorous thought, perhaps, but sobering as well for those in our community who might feel that wearing a kippah is involvement enough. "'I pray, I keep Shabbat,' they might say. Marvellous!" said Rabbi Salomon, "but you're missing something."

The danger, he suggested, is that observant Jews might be blinded to the need to reach out to their fellow Jews, thinking ritual observance is enough.

Jews comprise only one-fifth of one per cent of the world's population – or, as Salomon said, "basically zero." Basically zero, yet we account for 25 per cent of all Nobel Prizes and many more accomplishments. We are each so small, he said, yet we each have the ability, and responsibility, to change the world in our own unique way. Rabbi Weinberg, he said, called this the "power of one."

Rabbi Salomon spoke of an elderly Chassid he met whose entire family was killed in Auschwitz; he arrived in the United States alone and penniless after the war. Sixty years later, the man has between 300 and 400 descendants. "That's the power of one."

Rabbi Salomon called Rabbi Weinberg the ultimate contradiction, "both a pragmatist and a visionary, a thinker and a doer, so opinionated, but so open-minded... a fighter and a lover." Aish HaTorah, the little yeshiva Rabbi Weinberg started in an apartment in Jerusalem in 1974 – against the objections of rabbis who thought teaching unaffiliated Jews was foolish or impossible – now reaches more than a million people each year.

For Rabbi Salomon, Rabbi Weinberg's life illustrates the contradiction and challenge before every Jew today: living at once with the talmudic thought, "For my sake, the world was created," and its implications about our own importance, while putting aside any trace of ego – taking off the blindfold – to serve the Jewish people.

The Village Shul, a community Rabbi Weinberg loved and visited often, has been significant on the Toronto landscape. Rabbi Hoch called it an "unbelievable privilege," watching the synagogue evolve over the years to serve, beyond its own needs, those of the broader Jewish community.

The gala dinner, catered by Eran Marom of nearby Marron Bistro, included a tribute book featuring the photography of Toronto artist Marni Grossman, which highlighted close-ups of objects in the synagogue: a fine detail of the menorah, a corner of the sanctuary's Jerusalem-stone wall and the fringes on a folded tallit. In an essay in the tribute book, Rabbi Hoch wrote that the new name will "always inspire us to live up to Rav Noach's ideals."

Rabbi Weinberg "cared so much about this [Village Shul] community," said Rabbi Salomon. "There's no place I'd rather be on his yahrzeit."

New anti-Semitism threatens democracy: British MP

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN

A Sudanese minister compares the failure to reach consensus at the recent Copenhagen climate change conference to the Holocaust.

A Polish member of the Council of Europe says Poles will apologize to Jews for war-era atrocities when Jews apologize for having killed Poles.

Two leading British military scholars, one being Sir Martin Gilbert, are excluded from the United Kingdom's commission of inquiry into the Iraq war because they are Jews.

Meanwhile, Iran continues to be the world's greatest source of anti-Jewish and anti-Israel vitriol.

These are just a few examples of a new, frightening and escalating anti-Semitism gripping the globe, two parliamentarians told a synagogue audience last week.

Irwin Cotler

Anti-Semitism "attacks the core values of democracy" and "is defining an ongoing worldview that poses a huge challenge to democrats worldwide," warned British Labour MP Denis MacShane, who shared the podium with Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, Canada's former justice minister, at Shaar Shalom Synagogue.

MacShane, a non-Jew who chairs the European Institute for the Study of Contemporary Antisemitism and headed an all-party parliamentary commission of inquiry into anti-Semitism in Britain, said the "new" anti-Semitism in Europe is less about Holocaust denial than "Holocaust vandalization."

An example of the latter is the recent theft of the "Arbeit Macht Frei" sign at the Auschwitz concentration camp. The Polish government has issued an arrest warrant for a leading Swedish neo-Nazi in the case.

MacShane, who served in former prime minister Tony Blair's cabinet and addressed the Canadian Parliamentary Coalition to Combat Antisemitism, noted a "significant" rise in anti-Semitic incidents across Europe, while in Britain, the newest figures show a 70 per cent increase in anti-Jewish attacks last year over the year before.

Most of them, he pointed out, mix traditional anti-Semitism with anti-Zionism and anti-Israel prejudice, and "we are seeing a lively advance by hardline Islamists."

European universities, he added, are not doing enough to combat on-campus anti-Semitism and anti-Israel speakers, whose appearances are always defended under the guise of free speech.

"This is how rotten the European body politic has become."

In his talk, Cotler repeated many points contained in his address last year to the founding conference of the London, England-based Inter-parliamentary Coalition for Combating Antisemitism (ICCA).

An internationally recognized human rights advocate, Cotler said the world is witnessing an "escalating, sophisticated, global, virulent and even lethal anti-Semitism" not seen since the end of World War II.

He reserved his harshest condemnations for Iran, a "clear and present danger to international peace" because of four converging dangers: the nuclear threat; its voicing of "genocidal" anti-Zionism; its support for terrorism in the Middle East, and a "massive domestic assault" on the rights of its own citizens.

"Let there be no mistake about it," Cotler warned. "Iran is in standing violation of international prohibitions against the development and production of nuclear weapons. Indeed, [it is] a serial violator."

The regime is also guilty of incitement against minorities, prohibited under an international convention against genocide to which Iran is a signatory, he noted. Cotler said there are more incitements to genocide in Iran today than there were in Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia prior to ethnic slaughters in those countries.

"What we have here is the toxic conversion of the most horrific of crimes, genocide, embedded in the most enduring of hatreds, namely anti-Semitism."

There are several manifestations of this genocidal anti-Semitism, he explained, such as the call by Iran's president to "wipe Israel off the map." As well, there are the covenants and charters of Hamas, Islamic Jihad, Hezbollah and Al Qaeda, which not only call for the destruction of Israel and the killing of Jews worldwide, but also for terrorist acts in furtherance of those objectives. And there are fatwas – religiously-sanctioned writs – in which Jews are characterized as enemies of Islam, causing Israel to become "the Salman Rushdie of the nations."

Less overt, but perhaps more pernicious, forms of the new international anti-Semitism are ideological ones, in which anti-Judaism is "laundered" under the cover of the struggle against racism (and where Israel is tarred as an apartheid state), and "legalized" anti-Semitism seen in anti-Israel resolutions at the United Nations.

Cotler pointed to one sign of how Iran thumbs its nose at the international community: Interpol has issued an arrest warrant for the country's defence minister, Ahmad Vahidi, as a leading suspect in the 1994 bombing of the Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires, which killed 85 people.

The terrorism Iran supports "is not only Mideast-oriented, but has a global orientation." But by focusing solely on the nuclear threat, the international community risks ignoring or "sanitizing" the other threats.

Cotler's ultimate message is that "silence is not an option."

Jumping the gun in Hamas official's death

Assassinations, even alleged assassinations, in the Middle East are bound to attract a lot of media attention, especially if Israel is deemed to have carried them out.

That was surely the case late last month, when Hamas initially accused Israel of having recently assassinated one of its members.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

What's interesting is the different ways this story was reported and how it evolved.

Under the headline "Hamas Official Murdered in Dubai Hotel" (New York Times, Jan. 30), Robert Worth and Isabel Kershner reported that Hamas revealed the previous day that one of its senior officials, Mahmoud Mabhouh, had been murdered in his Dubai hotel room (on Jan. 20), and that it held Israel responsible and threatened to retaliate.

While the Times reporters noted that Mabhouh "is said to have organized the capture of two Israeli soldiers during a Palestinian uprising in the 1980s" and that he "was imprisoned several times by Israel," in the absence of any evidence, they did not speculate about the party responsible. They wrote only that "Israeli officials declined to comment."

However, Reuters reporter Khaled Yacoub Oweis, in "Israel accused in death," (National Post, Jan. 30) was less cautious about attributing responsibility. Oweis wrote that "Israel has killed dozens of leaders and military figures in Hamas, founded two decades ago as a religious resistance movement against Israeli occupation. Mr. Mabhouh is believed to have been an Israeli target since engineering the capture of Israeli soldiers in the 1980s during a Palestinian uprising."

Oweis quoted the Dubai police chief: "I cannot rule out the possibility of Mossad involvement in the assassination of Mabhouh." But not ruling it out is very different from taking it for granted.

Taking Israel's responsibility for granted seems even more pronounced in Patrick Martin's Feb. 1 Globe and Mail story, "Israel is prime suspect in killing of Hamas official."

Martin's opening line, "The apparent assassination of a senior Hamas official poses serious consequences for Israel – and for certain Israelis" points, without qualification, to Israel.

While Martin, like Oweis, noted that according to the Dubai police chief, the Mossad is "one suspect" and quoted him as saying that "I don't exclude any party that has an interest in the assassination," Martin himself mentioned no other possible parties other than Israel. In Martin's account, Israel is not only the "prime" suspect, it's the only suspect.

Nonetheless, when he wrote that Mabhouh "was developing Sudanese connections that have helped facilitate weapons smuggling from Iran into Gaza" and that "Hamas acknowledged that Mr. al-Mabhouh was in Dubai to buy weapons," Martin opened the door to a consideration of other parties that might also have an interest in seeing this senior Hamas operative dead. Martin, however, didn't pursue it.

Martin mentioned Ha'aretz reporter Avi Issacharoff, who wrote about the assassination. Ironically, on the same day Martin's story appeared, Issacharoff provided the following revelation in Ha'aretz:

"A preliminary investigation conducted by Hamas suggests that the assassination of one of its officials in Dubai last month was likely carried out by agents of an Arab government, and not by Israel's Mossad spy agency… A Hamas source told Ha'aretz on [Feb. 1] that Mabhouh was wanted by authorities in both Jordan and Egypt, where he previously spent a year in prison."

Citing a Hamas leader in Lebanon, Issacharoff added that Hamas also "suspects its Palestinian rivals in the West Bank," namely, Mahmoud Abbas' Palestinian Authority.

Back on Jan. 29, Issacharoff and Amos Harel ("Choosing Up Sides in the Middle East") remarked that with Iran's increasing and destabilizing intrusion into the region (supporting Syria, Hezbollah and Hamas), "Egypt and Jordan are co-ordinating security matters with Israel in an impressive way."

So it shouldn't be difficult to assume that in the case of Mabhouh, several parties, any of which acting alone, or in concert, could have been responsible for his murder.

Journalists writing about this – since there is only speculation and no hard evidence at this time – need to keep a broad, open mind, especially in light of the changing balance of regional forces.

At the same time, she said, "I think we will always have differences – differences in who we are and how we approach things."

As for IJV, Saunders said the Church "regretted" its prior relationship with the group. "I'd also like to clarify that we have a longstanding relationship with Canadian Jewish Congress and see it as the place for dialogue. We don't have any formal relationship with IJV."

Asked whether she thought Congress' concerns might have been caused by the Church considering positions similar to those of IJV that are harshly critical of Israel, Saunders sidestepped the query, saying differences must be resolved "by sitting down and talking directly from time to time and to remember the things in common, as well as the differences."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

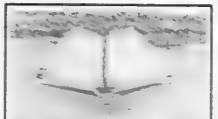
From lowliness to leadership

By RABBI JARROD GROVER



Former prime minister Jean Chrétien recounts many memorable and entertaining vignettes in his memoirs. One tells of a peculiar realization from the G7 conference hosted by Canada in Halifax in 1995.

To entertain these world leaders, Chrétien invited Cirque du Soleil to perform. Afterward, one of the performers approached Chrétien and asked if he could be introduced to British Prime Minister John Major. Chrétien happily agreed and listened in as the two shook hands. The performer explained that his father was a friend of Major's father when they were in the circus together many years before.

Realizing that Major was the son of a circus performer, Chrétien proceeded to survey the other leaders in the room. There was chancellor Helmut Kohl of Germany, the son of a minor tax official. Nearby was president Jacques Chirac of France, the son of a low-level bank clerk. Russian president Boris Yeltsin's father was a construction worker. U.S. president Bill Clinton was the stepson of an alcoholic car dealer. Chrétien himself was one of 19 children born to a factory machinist from Shawinigan, Que.

Gathered together in Halifax were the leaders of the most powerful countries of the world, and all of them were ordinary people. There were no wealthy big shots or fine old families standing behind any of them.

Chrétien's observation is a wonderful tribute to the greatness of democracy. At the same time, it also teaches us much about being a popular political leader. Although there are always exceptions, we tend to have an affinity for candidates who can understand our own struggles.

There's a midrash that teaches that when Solomon built the Temple, he offered the following prayer: "Lord of the world, if a man prays for riches, and You know that they would be bad for him, give them not to him, but if You see a man who riches would become, then grant them." Solomon, the son of great wealth and privilege, thus reflects back on his life and considers the potential detriments of his upbringing. Depending on the person, riches have the potential to hurt a person.

We all know stories of people who have been hurt by newfound wealth. It's the lottery winner who ditches his family and friends only to find life filled with empty replacements to once meaningful relationships. It's the successful businessman who spends his fortunes unwisely, discovering empty accounts when business turns sour.

Further, if the great national leaders Chrétien surveys at the G7 had come from privilege, would they have been as successful? If they had no struggles to overcome, would they ever have had characters deserving of popularity?

It's easy to compare our fortunes to those of others and feel sorry for ourselves. And yet faith asks us at least to consider that struggles can be a blessing. They can form the very road that establishes our greatness.

Rabbi Jarrod Grover is assistant rabbi at Beth Tikvah Synagogue in Toronto.

Standing together

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

There's an interesting distinction about Israel the country that usually goes unnoticed. There's no question that Israel is a modern political state that deals with internal politics, economics and legalities while also negotiating tricky international relationships. As such, many Jews outside of Israel feel that the view we have of the country cannot accurately reflect the view of citizens within the country who must live there every day. With respect, Jews outside of Israel defer to this distinction, as there is validity to it.

But the other side of Israel, the country isn't political, but rather has to do with the fact that it's a Jewish country, and in that way, it connects to Jews outside Israel as part of the Jewish People and Jewish religion. In that regard, every Jewish person is a citizen of this Jewish country, and every Jewish person has "internal" views about its Jewish expressions. This view of Israel does not touch on politics, but goes to the core of the Jewish soul.

In November 2009, a Jewish woman was arrested at the Kotel in Jerusalem for wearing a tallit and praying from a Torah. A Jewish policeman arrested a Jewish woman for wearing a Jewish garment at a Jewish place of holiness. This isn't about politics, it's about our Jewish soul.

Starting at Mount Sinai with the signing of the covenant between God and the Jewish people, the rabbis expressed that Judaism was communicated by God in multiple voices and, therefore, heard by the people in multiple ways. There is no question that throughout Jewish history, groups of Jews have preferred certain expressions and condemned others. Until recently, condemning a Jewish expression meant not attending a particular minyan. In November, it began to mean Jews arresting other Jews because we don't like how they're talking to God.

We should all be alarmed at crossing this line. It's not about whether or not anyone agrees that a woman should or should not wear a tallit or read from the Torah, it's about whether we support Jewish expressions of faith as a beautiful thing. In today's world, we should be grateful that Jewish spirituality is finding an expression in community and prayer. Instead, we are arresting someone as if we are God's protectors, as if God cannot defend the Divine Honour.

This goes beyond modern concerns, but frighteningly reminds us of a warning that's clearly stated in the Talmud. The First Temple of Jerusalem was lost because of the sins of idolatry, immorality and bloodshed. The Second Temple was lost for a greater sin: baseless hatred – one Jew hating another Jew and dividing the people. How ironic that the site of the arrest was the Kotel, the Western Wall, all that remains of the Second Temple.

Jews around the world have been responding to this event with petitions and e-mails of protest. In Toronto, there will be an event planned that doesn't respond with protest, but with support. On Feb. 14 at 10 a.m., a community prayer event will be held at the Prosserman JCC to support the woman who was arrested and to support Jewish expression.

In Toronto, we're blessed with many venues for Jewish learning, and yet Pirkei Avot reminds us that actions must be the result of our learning. "The one whose deeds exceed the learning is compared to a tree whose branches are few and whose roots are many, so that even if all the winds in the world come and blow, they will not move it from its place." We can choose to hate and divide, or we can choose to gather together and support.

Ultimately, Hillel's words echo through the centuries: if not now, when?

Earliest Israelite inscriptions

By ALEX GROPPER

A discovery of an ancient 10th-century BCE inscription in the Elah Valley in Israel drew worldwide media attention recently. The CJN featured the story on its front page on Jan. 14.

One of the reasons for this interest is that some scholars believe that writing was not widespread in ancient Israel before the destruction of the First Temple and the Babylonian captivity. It is widely believed that the books of the Bible were not brought together until the sojourn in Babylon, during the sixth century BCE.

Past Forward

However, there is evidence of the use of writing in the land even before the Israelite period (after 1200 BCE). A number of examples have been found in pre-Israelite Canaan at Shechem, Gezer and Lachish. At the site of Ugarit, in what is now coastal Syria, an entire archive in which an alphabetic script, written with cuneiform symbols, was found. The cuneiform symbols had been invented in Mesopotamia some 2,000 years earlier.

Indeed, some of the language used in the Ugaritic documents has a strong resemblance to biblical Hebrew. The archive dates to the latter part of the Bronze Age, just before Israel emerged on the scene, and just prior to the earliest mention of Israel outside of the Bible.

The earliest extra-biblical inscription mentioning Israel is the Merneptah Stela (a stela is a formal inscription on stone, usually commemorating an important event). It dates to the reign of Pharaoh Merneptah, the son of Ramses II, around the end of the 13th century BCE, with the date usually given as 1207 BCE. It states that there was a people called Israel living in Canaan at that time.

As for the earliest alphabetic inscription written in Hebrew, one has to go back to the 12th century BCE. At a number of sites in Israel, inscriptions have been found that show there was an alphabetic script in use in the land adopted by our ancestors.

At Khirbet Radanna, an early Iron Age site, evidence of alphabetic writing has been found inscribed on a pottery handle. It was there that one of the earliest examples of the so-called Israelite "four-room house" was found. The presence of the four-room house is usually a strong indicator of Israelite settlement.

Khirbet Radanna is just north of Jerusalem, near the Arab village of Deir Dibwan. It was a site that I was involved in excavating in 1968, under the leadership of Prof. Joseph Callaway. Callaway was a pupil of the legendary English archeologist Kathleen Kenyon, who dug at both Jericho and Jerusalem. She played an important role in the archeology of the Holy Land by introducing her excavation techniques to the area. Because of his meticulous fieldwork, which he had learned from Kenyon, Callaway's important discovery was not seriously challenged.

At Izbet Sartah, near Aphek, on the coastal plain near the source of the Yarkon River, an abecedary, dating to the 12th century BCE, the period of the Judges, was found. An abecedary is a teaching aid that was used for practising writing the alphabet. In this case, experts have said the abecedary belonged to a middle-aged individual who was learning his or her letters.

The site itself contains one of the earliest Israelite settlements on the coastal plain, and the person practising his or her aleph-bet was probably an Israelite. It shows that one is never too old to learn.

This brings to mind what the great Harvard scholar Frank Cross once told me. He said that the alphabet democratized knowledge.

It was this democratization of knowledge that would play a role in the ideals of universal justice that our prophets have given humankind. Their words would become a beacon to the world, and they were written in an alphabetic script.

Israel goes to Winter Olympics

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

When you picture Israelis facing off against elite international athletes, you might think of them competing in sports like judo or windsurfing. But how about ice dancing or downhill skiing? That's what they'll be doing when the world's finest meet this month at the XXI Olympic Winter Games in Vancouver.

The Jewish Highway

Although this is the fifth Israeli delegation to the winter games, they must be used to being overshadowed by their high-profile summer counterparts. Even Israel's official Olympic website barely mentions them. [bit.ly/isrolym01] Israel first sent a winter delegation to the Olympic Games in Lillehammer, Norway, in 1994, where skater Michael Shmerkin finished a respectable 16th. At Nagano, Japan, in 1998, Shmerkin was joined by ice dancers Galit Chait and Sergei Sakhnovski, and the pair would return to compete twice more, finishing as high as sixth in Salt Lake City in 2002. [bit.ly/isrolym02]

The Israeli contingent grew to five in Salt Lake City, where Israel first competed in short-track speedskating, with Olga Danilov placing 14th. Many familiar names were back in Turin, Italy, in 2006, where Chait danced with Sakhnovski and Alexandra (Sasha) Zaretsky paired off with her brother, Roman. That year, Israel was first represented off the rink by alpine skier, Ukrainian oleh Mikail Renzhin. [bit.ly/isrolym03]

Renzhin will be there this year, but one Israeli hopeful won't be there. Although figure skater Tamar Katz qualified according to Olympic standards, the Israeli Olympic Committee decided that she was not strong enough to compete. Boris Chait, chairman of the Israel Ice Skating Federation, disagrees. He told the New York Times: "I'm trying to explain that these people are ambassadors. We've been to countries where people come up and say, 'We didn't know you Israelis knew how to skate. We thought you only knew how to shoot' … Israel is not like Germany or the United States, where they can be choosy. They have hundreds of athletes, all capable of winning medals." [bit.ly/isrolym04]

The Zaretskys will also be back again this year. The three-time Israeli national champions came in 13th at the 2009 World Figure Skating Championships in Los Angeles. Roman, 26, and his sister, Alexandra, 22, were born in Minsk, Belarus, and immigrated to Israel in 1992. You can learn more at their official website [bit.ly/isrolym05] and watch them perform to Ray Charles' Hit the Road Jack. [bit.ly/isrolym06]

Like most of Israel's top winter athletes, the Zaretskys live and train in the United States. That can be controversial, but the athletes say they need to be there for the facilities and the coaching. "We may train in the U.S. most of the time, but we grew up in Metulla and we are proud to be Israeli," Roman Zaretsky told the Jerusalem Post. "We chose to skate with the music of Hava Nagila and Schindler's List for a reason. We want to make Israel proud and show the world that we are here." [bit.ly/isrolym09]

Speaking of music, there has been some noticeable Jewish content leading up to the Games in Vancouver. Official Olympic broadcaster NBC has been featuring in their ads the song One Day, by chassidic reggae star Matisyahu. [bit.ly/isrolym08]

Although they haven't had a chance to represent their country at the Olympics (yet), I do want to mention that Israel does boast its own bobsled team. Reminiscent of the Jamaican bobsled team that caused a stir at the 1988 Winter Olympics in Calgary, the Israelis have participated in two world championships. The team maintains a Facebook page, where you can keep track of their progress. [bit.ly/isrolym10] The team's website is not being updated, but it does have a great video of them whizzing by in their slick blue and white sled. [bit.ly/isrolym11]

Realistically, none of the Israeli athletes to Vancouver is expected to come home with gold (or silver or bronze). That may take a bit of time. After all, it took 40 years of competition until Israel won silver and bronze at the 1992 Summer Olympic Games in Barcelona. And it wasn't until 2004 in Athens that Hatikvah was played as an emotional Gal Fridman was awarded gold for his incredible achievement in windsurfing. [bit.ly/isrolym12]

Hopefully, it won't take Israel's winter elite quite as long.

Netivot students join survivor interview project

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN

"Tales told from the heart reach the heart," children's book author Steve Sanfield tells us. So it promises to be for a select group of Grade 8 students at Netivot HaTorah Day School in Thornhill who have embarked on a very special project.

Guest Voice

No field trips here. No shoebox dioramas to be built.

Beginning March 8, 19 Netivot students will interview local Holocaust survivors, and the sessions will be filmed. Working in pairs, the kids craft their own questions after careful study (and prepare for any eventuality that may arise), conduct the interviews, operate the equipment, and edit the final, 15-minute cuts.

It may sound like something director Steven Spielberg thought up, but it's actually the brainchild of American educator Tova Fish-Rosenberg, who six years ago created "Names, Not Numbers," an interactive, multimedia, intergenerational Holocaust oral history project that, as its website understates, "takes the teaching of the Holocaust and its lessons well beyond many previous efforts."

To date, nearly 300 students in grades 8 and 12 in seven U.S. cities have successfully interviewed and videotaped 110 survivors and World War II veterans. The curriculum and project have received wide attention stateside, and Rosenberg has been awarded the prestigious Baumel Award for Excellence in Jewish Studies from Yeshiva University.

As at other schools, the kids at Netivot – the first Canadian school to be chosen for Names, Not Numbers – will sit face to face with those who lived through the history being taught.

They also learn which questions to ask, and how to ask them.

Which is where I come in.

Recently, I was flattered to be invited to Netivot to talk to the students involved about interviewing techniques, especially when it involves a topic as massive and potentially touchy as the Holocaust.

I was prepared to explain the difference between interviewing for historical or archival purposes, and what journalists often do, which is to try to exact maximum drama from a subject. But if I've learned anything through 30 years of talking to Holocaust survivors, including both of my parents, it's this: pretty much anything they say is dramatic and worth preserving.

I stressed heavily the importance of being prepared with advance study of the pre-chosen subject's birthplace and places of incarceration, and of fine-tuning questions in ways that yield fuller, more detailed answers. (Example: "How do you feel about Holocaust deniers?" versus "Should Holocaust deniers be prosecuted?")

I also advised the students that while it's important to exercise sensitivity, they should not be afraid to ask direct or difficult questions. By their very nature, survivors are tough.

Still, the kids rightly expressed concerns.

What if a survivor breaks down while being filmed? What if they ramble off-topic? What if they answer with just a "yes" or "no"?

One slight lad wondered, "What if I break down?"

In a role-playing session to round out our encounter, I played the survivor. The students had learned their lessons, for they listened well enough to pick out specifics of my answers, stray momentarily from their scripts, and request elaboration.

I was impressed enough to ask to sit in on their interviews.

HELPING THE HUNGRY: As the final stage of a tikkun olam project, Grade 6 students at Leo Baeck Day School's Holy Blossom campus sorted more than 1,000 pounds of food for Toronto's needy at the North York Harvest Food Bank. The students collected more than 2,300 pounds of non-perishable food items. Pictured with the students are branch principal Jonathan Harris, back left, and social studies teacher Marc Kates.

I AM 83 AND REFUSE TO LET LIFE PASS ME BY.
Deciding where you live next—and when to move—should be your choice. So maybe now's the best time to choose a community that has all you need for tomorrow. Like your own beautiful apartment in a cheerful and warm environment. Where you can spend your time at wonderful activities instead of maintaining your home. And where a range of quality, professional care is available, should you ever need it. Come see for yourself.

Gustav Klimt masterpiece fetches $45.4 million at auction

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A Gustav Klimt masterpiece that was lost during the Holocaust and had been in the collection of a Viennese Jewish family sold for over $45.4 million (Cdn) at auction in London last week, changing the life of the painting's rightful Montreal owner to whom it had been restored.

The family's heir, Georges Jorisch, 81, who has lived modestly and obscurely in Montreal since 1956, is sharing the proceeds of that sale with the painting's unidentified owner, under an agreement that was brokered by Sotheby's auction house.

Sotheby's said the family of the other party to the agreement had acquired Church in Cassone "in good faith and with legal title," and that they "voluntarily agreed" with Jorisch to offer the painting at auction.

The terms of that agreement and identity of the purchaser have been kept confidential. The winning bid was more than 50 per cent higher than Sotheby's high-end estimate – about $30 million – of what it would go for.

Jorisch's son Stéphane Jorisch told The CJN that his father, who went to London for the auction, was "very happy, but very tired."

The younger Jorisch, with his three siblings, grew up listening to his father's incredible stories of his privileged childhood in Vienna and how it was all destroyed.

"We never believed this would happen, but my father has a lot of perseverance," he said, alluding to the fact that the owners of the painting had the resources to put up a legal challenge if they wanted to.

He said his father began looking into the recovery of his grandmother's art collection about 10 or 15 years ago, with the changes in laws in Europe and the United States that make the recovery of art despoiled during World War II more feasible.

However, Stéphane would not say when his father began pursuing this particular picture or how he learned of its whereabouts.

The original owners of Church in Cassone, a square oil-on-canvas Italian landscape painted in 1913, were Georges Jorisch's great-uncle, Viktor Zuckerkandl, an iron magnate, and his wife, Paula.

Sotheby's describes the Zuckerkandls' collection as one of the greatest early collections of the work of the Austrian Klimt, who is often cited among the most outstanding painters of the 20th century. Viktor and his siblings were leading patrons of the arts in turn-of-the-century Vienna.

Eight rabbis team up to meet athletes' needs

"They told us that the needs of individual athletes won't be known until they arrive," he said. "But consider that the athletes are people who have spent 10 years, perhaps their whole lives, preparing for this one activity. Most of them are not going to get the medal, so one can only imagine what will be going on inside their heads."

The multifaith committee has Christian, Hindu, Muslim, Buddhist and Jewish clergy, and each member has sought assistance from other clergy in their communities.

Rabbi Birnham, who will be juggling his full-time job at Har El with his Olympics responsibilities, has asked eight rabbis from all affiliations in Greater Vancouver to cover different times during the Games.

The other rabbis weren't so keen to volunteer for the job initially, Rabbi Birnham said. But as the date of the Winter Olympics drew closer, they became more enthusiastic about participating.

There will be Friday night and Saturday morning prayer services in each village, and each rabbi will be available on an as-needed basis for spiritual or religious counseling.

VANOC, the local Olympic organizing committee, told the multifaith committee that approximately one per cent of the participants in the Winter Olympics will seek assistance from the multifaith clergy.

"There's a total of about 5,500 athletes, and some will come with families and coaches," Rabbi Birnham said. "There could be 30 Jewish people in each village. But they may want nothing to do with a rabbi."

If they do choose to get involved, the rabbis will have prayer books and tallits on hand, and they'll host small kiddushes and onegs over Shabbat.

"We haven't organized a Friday night meal because we have no idea of the numbers," Rabbi Birnham said. "Once we meet the Jewish athletes, we can ask about those kinds of things."

Of course, the rabbis may well provide counselling or a spiritual ear to athletes who are religiously unaffiliated, too.

And all the clergy have been prepped about the "three-metre rule."

"When we're visiting in the Olympic villages, we've been told to smile, reach out and be friendly to anyone within three metres, to create a real atmosphere of connecting," Rabbi Birnham said.

"If someone non-Jewish wants to talk to us, of course, we'll talk."

As the start of the Games approached, he said he was feeling honoured and excited.

"All of us are looking forward to being there to help the athletes," he said earnestly. "Wherever their needs go, we'll help."

There are no synagogues in Vancouver's downtown corridor, so it's unlikely Olympic security will affect any services or community activity.

Romy Ritter, regional director of Canadian Jewish Congress' Pacific region, said it will be "business as usual during the Olympics," for the Vancouver Jewish community.

"Members of our community will be attending events and participating in the Olympics, and there's heightened security in some congregations, and certainly heightened awareness," she said.

At Ohel Ya'akov Community Kollel in Vancouver, Rabbi Shmuel Yeshayahu said there will be "more events for tourists this month than usual, but everything other than that will remain mostly the same."

Meanwhile, a local Jewish woman who competed in the 1972 Munich Olympics will be among the last torch bearers carrying the Olympic flame on its way to BC Place Stadium for the opening ceremonies.

Karen James, who chairs women's philanthropy for the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver, will carry the flame about 300 metres on the afternoon of Feb. 12 in downtown Vancouver.

"It's very thrilling," said James, who swam the 200-metre individual medley in Munich and placed "17th or 18th." She can't remember exactly.

At the 1972 Games, James was returning to the Olympic Village after hours when, rather than walk around to the main gate, she and her friends took a shortcut over a fence. Some dark figures nearby decided to climb with them.

The next morning, James said, she awoke to the sound of helicopters and remembers watching Israeli athletes and coaches who had been taken hostage by Palestinian terrorists being led out to a bus. Eleven Israelis died later in a failed rescue attempt at a nearby airport.

On Feb. 14, James will light a candle in their memory at a ceremony in Vancouver.

"The Olympics – in general ever since then – I have mixed feelings," James said. "I always sort of sit with that ambiguity."

To keep the Vancouver Games secure, officials plan to deploy a reported force of about 15,000 at a cost of $1 billion.

As part of the Jewish community's observance of the Olympics, the Vancouver Holocaust Centre will run an exhibit for the duration of the Winter Games highlighting Canada's dilemma over whether to participate in the so-called Nazi Olympics, the 1936 Games in Berlin. It was in Berlin that many features of the modern Olympics were introduced, including the idea of a torch relay, according to the centre's executive director, Frieda Miller.

"We were very careful not to make a direct link between those Games and the contemporary Games," Miller told JTA. "It's not a polemic. We do not pass judgment. We present the dilemmas and the situation as is and let people make their own analogies."

Turmoil at federal agency

In earlier comments made to the CBC, Allmand said the Conservative government had "packed" its board with members who share the "biases" of Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

Problems at Rights and Democracy, which operates on an $11-million annual budget, erupted after Harper's government installed new board members in 2009.

Disagreements arose over the propriety of funding organizations such as Al-Haq, which is based in the West Bank town of Ramallah and monitors human rights violations, and Al Mezan, which promotes human rights from its headquarters in the Jabalya Palestinian refugee camp in the Gaza Strip.

The philosophical clashes reportedly pitted old and new board members against each other and involved the agency's 47 staff members.

Aurel Braun

Remy Beauregard, the president of Rights and Democracy, died after a stormy board meeting early last month.

After his sudden death, a public letter bearing all the names of the agency's employees was sent to Braun and two of his fellow board members. The letter said they had lost confidence in Braun and demanded his immediate resignation.

Since then, three senior managers have been reportedly suspended with pay and a host of non-governmental human rights organizations have called Braun's comments a "public smear campaign" intended to stymie NGOs from monitoring and reporting human rights violations.

Last week, Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister Lawrence Cannon told reporters that he would not intervene in Rights and Democracy discussions at the board level and that he would "make sure that [it] is smooth-running and functioning correctly."

Cannon met Braun in Ottawa late last week, and Braun described the meeting as "very constructive."

The controversy swirling around Rights and Democracy is reminiscent of the federal government's decision late last year to cut funding to KAIROS, a church-based organization that Immigration Minister Jason Kenney charged has taken "a leadership role in the boycott, divestment and sanctions" campaign against Israel.

Braun, a professor of international relations and political science, claimed the director of Al-Haq, Shawan Jabarin, is a senior activist in the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, which has carried out terrorist attacks aimed at Israel since the Six Day War.

Several years ago, Jabarin, who has denied membership in the PFLP, was prevented by Israel from travelling to the Netherlands to accept a Dutch human rights prize. Israeli and international human rights groups protested the ban.

Israel's Supreme Court reviewed the case, but dismissed a petition calling for an end to the travel ban, prompting the Dutch foreign minister to express disappointment.

According to Braun, Al Mezan, or the Al Mezan Center for Human Rights, has justified the killings of Israeli civilians by terrorists as acts of resistance, branded Israel as a criminal entity and participated in the anti-Israel boycott and divestment campaign.

NGO Monitor, an Israeli organization in Jerusalem, says that Al Mezan has pursued "a virulently anti-Israel political agenda, while entirely ignoring Palestinian terrorism."

B'Tselem – an Israeli NGO whose stated objective is "to document and educate the Israeli public and policymakers about human rights violations in the occupied territories" – has defended Al Mezan, saying it attempts "to address the needs of the marginalized" Palestinian population in the territories.

Braun, claiming that B'Tselem has taken "a very partisan" position on the Arab-Israeli dispute, said it does not deserve to be funded by Rights and Democracy, which was created in the late 1980s by then-prime minister Brian Mulroney to encourage democracy and monitor human rights.

B'Tselem, formally known as The Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories, provides information to Knesset members, participates in protests in the West Bank and publishes material on such current issues as torture, restrictions on movement and expropriation of land.

Braun said that Beauregard, just days before his untimely death of a heart attack, decided to "repudiate" the grants to Al-Haq, Al Mezan and B'Tselem.

"He understood that funding these groups was a huge mistake. He admitted we shouldn't have funded these organizations. He said we should have done our homework better."

Lamenting that the atmosphere at Rights and Democracy has turned poisonous of late, Braun said his opponents have launched a "vicious," "repugnant" and "irresponsible" smear campaign of "misrepresentation" against him and some of his fellow board members.

To Braun, the main issues here are accountability and transparency.

Charging that the chairman's report had been sent to Parliament before he had an opportunity to read it, he said, "The board has to be responsible to the Canadian people, but we did not receive cooperation from the staff and found serious problems.

"This is about accountability and transparency," he reiterated.

Attempts to elicit comments from the acting president of Rights and Democracy, Jacques Gauthier, were unsuccessful. Gauthier was twice reached by phone in Washington, D.C., but he was unable to answer questions. On the third attempt to contact him, his voice mailbox was full.

Being gay 'shouldn't be a struggle,' YU student says

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

When Toronto native Avi Kopstick considered holding a panel discussion at Yeshiva University on gay issues, he was hesitant.

Kopstick, who is openly gay, helped start the Orthodox school's Tolerance Club in September 2008, but he didn't want to harm his group's reputation by organizing such an event.

"We already had this reputation of being the gay club," Kopstick, a chemistry major who's scheduled to graduate this year, said of the Tolerance Club, which spreads awareness about racial and sexual minorities on campus.

"It wasn't helping our success. We were thinking of not doing anything of the sort."

Kopstick changed his mind after reading an anonymous public letter written by a student who was too scared to come out of the closet. A YU student newspaper wrote about the letter, which helped Kopstick open up a dialogue.

"I was really hoping to reach struggling people who are still in the closet," he said. "That was my goal for being on the panel. I didn't want people to feel the need to write anonymous letters."

The controversial panel event, called Being Gay in the Orthodox World, was held Dec. 22 at the university, and attracted about 800 people.

The reaction from the school's administration was almost immediate.

After the event, Yeshiva University president Richard Joel and Rabbi Yona Reiss, dean of YU's Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary (RIETS), issued a statement saying that, because of recent events "we want to reiterate the absolute prohibition of homosexual relationships according to Jewish law."

A letter, signed by six rabbis, was posted around the campus, stating that "homosexual activity constitutes an abomination."

Rabbi Mayer Twersky, one of the roshei yeshiva at RIETS, responded to the panel with a speech.

"There was a point in which such a shmooze would have been unimaginable... Not only unnecessary, but inappropriate. Wrong," he said to a group of students on Dec. 28.

"Appropriate sympathy [for gay students] is correct and warranted, but it's a travesty when that sympathy is... exploited to create... a new category of a Jew who should be able to come out of the closet and identify himself," Rabbi Twersky added.

Kopstick, who has been openly gay since he was 18, disagrees with Rabbi Twersky.

"[Rabbi Twersky] was the voice of fire and brimstone. He said basically that the event was a desecration of the school and a desecration of Heaven," Kopstick said, adding that the rabbi also sent out a petition after his speech urging students to condemn the Dec. 22 panel.

Kopstick knows that being gay in the Orthodox Jewish community isn't easy. He said he decided to attend YU in New York because of the lack of support groups in Toronto's Orthodox community.

Justine Apple has seen first-hand the difficulties faced by Orthodox gays and lesbians.

As executive director of Kulanu Toronto, Toronto's Jewish social group for lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered people, Apple has met Orthodox Jews who have struggled to come out of the closet.

"I think in the extreme Orthodox areas in Toronto, it wouldn't be accepted to do what we're doing," she said. "We have [a Kulanu member] who comes from an Orthodox background and she's very closeted. If her name gets out, that's the end."

Apple thinks groups such as the Tolerance Club would be good to have in any Orthodox institution.

"Orthodox Jews who are gay are not readily accepted into the community," she said. "For them to have a tolerance group, it takes a lot of courage."

For Kopstick, it took more courage to come out of the closet than to start the group at YU.

"The scariest part... is not really knowing what the risks are. You get a sense from what people say, what their viewpoints might be, but [you]... come face to face with someone [you] love, you never really know," he said, adding that he told his rabbi about his sexuality when he was 18, and his parents when he was 20.

"I can't say they're not disappointed, but they still love me," he said.

While Kopstick said he has enjoyed his time at YU, he knows of some gay students who have struggled.

"My time wasn't made worse because I was gay," he said. 'But there are students who go to YU and have difficulty. Usually they're... in the closet. If your rabbi doesn't know you're gay, he's not going to talk more sympathetically when he talks about these issues."

When rabbis talk about the fact that homosexuality is forbidden in Halachah, Kopstick doesn't get upset.

"I think to do anything less would be intellectually dishonest... it's very clear what the Halachah has to say on the matter," he said.

The controversy at YU hasn't stopped Kopstick from encouraging others to come out of the closet.

"I would like to universalize this challenge," he said. "It shouldn't just be a really sad struggle for someone who's gay. It should be something that all Jews recognize as something very difficult."

Students raise more than $13,000 for Haiti

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Hunger is not a laughing matter. But the laughter was resounding at a recent comedy event that raised more than $13,000 for hunger relief in Haiti.

The Charity Comedy Night, held Jan. 31, was organized by the Canadian Feed the Children (CFTC) club at the University of Western Ontario.

CFTC club co-president Elan Panov, a third-year science student, co-produced the show with award-winning, Toronto-based comedy writers Daniel and Steven Shehori.

Elan Panov, left, and Daniel Shehori organized the recent Canadian Feed the Children comedy fundraiser through the University of Western Ontario.

More than 200 Western students showed up at the London Music Hall for a night of stand-up comedy, headlined by Nathan Macintosh.

"The event was amazing," Panov said. "We packed the place. The people who came out had a great time. The comedians were hilarious."

Daniel Shehori described the audience as "enthusiastic." He said many of the students knew each other, and that seemed to make them more receptive to the comedians.

He noted that comedian Josh Saltzman, a former Western student who grew up in Thornhill, Ont., drew on his Jewish roots to connect with the group. "I'm guessing, but I think 80 per cent of the audience was Jewish. Josh had a lot of fun with that."

The CFTC comedy night was a family affair. In October, Panov approached the Shehori brothers, who are his cousins, to help with CFTC-Western's annual fundraiser.

As well, his mother, Rochelle Schwartz, offered to raise funds to underwrite the cost of the show.

Panov said the Shehoris were the ideal partners.

"Daniel and Steven are comedy writers and producers. They promote comedians and comedy events. They were all for helping with the fundraiser."

He said they were able to get two comedians from Toronto, Macintosh and Saltzman, "at great prices," while the three London comics donated their services.

Panov said raising funds for disadvantaged people has been an important focus of his university experience.

"I started the Canadian Feed the Children club at Western to get involved in a charitable organization on campus," he said. "I was drawn to Canadian Feed the Children because they help poor children all over the world. Once I started getting involved, it opened my eyes. So many children live in poverty.

"It made me realize how much I have… Fundraising for Canadian Feed the Children is my way to give back."

After the devastating earthquake hit Haiti in January, CFTC requested that the Charity Comedy Night be in support of Haiti, Panov said. "You see the Haitians on TV. You hear their heart-wrenching stories. We were very willing to send the money to Haiti."

Back in October Panov set a modest fundraising goal. "We thought $2,000 would be a nice sum. Now we're over $13,000," he said.

"My mom had sent out all these letters. Once the earthquake in Haiti happened and people got word that we were fundraising for Haiti, the donations started flowing. People were very generous. They opened up their hearts and wallets for Haiti."

Israeli wines available in Vancouver

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — If you're in Vancouver and in the mood for a glass of good kosher vino, you won't have to look too hard to find it.

Thanks to the hard work of International Cellars Inc., which represents Galil Mountain, Dalton Wines and Golan Heights Winery (the latter better known under their Yarden label), Israeli wines are now available in local liquor stores and in a handful of restaurants including Cactus Club, Gastown's PourHouse and Kerrisdale's Senova.

"We've been working with Israeli wine for the past two years, and we've been very persistent," says Norman Gladstone, co-director of International Cellars Inc. "Having these wines listed in restaurants doesn't happen overnight – you have to keep at it until you finally make some progress. It takes time and exposure."

Galil Mountain pinot noir accepted on its own merits

The restaurant listings came simply because Israeli wine is very good, Gladstone says. "The Galil Mountain pinot noir is very good, and when we presented it to Cactus Club, they accepted it on its own merits."

Based in Vancouver, International Cellars imports and markets wines from 12 countries. Israeli wines represent less than 1 per cent of the company's volume, and Gladstone only began marketing Israeli wines after being approached by the British Columbia liquor distribution branch.

"They said they had a need and some interest in listing Israeli wines for a special Israel section in their liquor stores," he recalls. "It was exciting and interesting to us that they were willing to create an Israel section, as opposed to a kosher section."

The challenge when it comes to Israeli wines is not just exposure but also price. "It would be nice to find Israeli wines with lower prices than what we have now," Gladstone reflects.

The cost per bottle ranges between $18 and $40 today, mainly because Israel is a high-cost producer and doesn't have large tracts of vineyards. That, coupled with the dollar-to-shekel exchange rate and the expensive cost of importing the wine across the ocean accounts for the relatively high price tag, Gladstone says.

He's hopeful for the future of Israeli wine in Canada, though he says there's much work to be done.

"Israel has a seat at the international wine table, but it's at the end of the table," he says. "It's going to take a huge effort on our part as importers, and on the part of the Israeli trade commission, to establish Israel as a wine entity. For now, the country is fighting for market share against well-established countries like Italy, France and Spain – tough competitors."

PLANTING AHEAD

Samara Green and Justin Levinsky, Grade 2 students from Bialik Hebrew Day School, decorate pots for Tu b'Shvat. When all the students have decorated their flower pots, they will use them to plant dill that will grow for use during Passover or later in the spring. This was one of several activities the students enjoyed during a session of games related to Tu b'Shvat, led by representatives of JNF, to enrich the students' understanding of the significance of this holiday.

London rabbi recalled for interfaith work

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Joel Ira Wittstein, spiritual leader of Temple Israel in London, Ont. since 1987, died at his home on Jan. 28, of cancer. He was 74.

A native of Cincinnati, Rabbi Wittstein will be remembered not only for his congregational leadership and personal integrity, but also for his interfaith and interdenominational work in the greater London community.

In addition to teaching Hebrew at Huron University College at the University of Western Ontario (UWO) for some 20 years – as he had at the University of Cincinnati – Rabbi Wittstein co-founded the Centre for Catholic-Jewish Learning at King's University College at UWO. He also established Abraham's Café, a project to foster dialogue and understanding among Jews, Christians and Muslims.

As well, he organized an annual community-wide Shabbat service for Reform, Conservative and Orthodox Jews to promote co-operation and understanding, and contributed to program notes and an information forum dealing with anti-Semitic themes in St. John's Passion at Parry Sound's Festival of the Sound, where he was honoured last summer.

The rabbi was an accomplished poet, classical music lover, expert pool player, and "a mensch," Rabbi Daniel Gottlieb told an estimated 600 mourners at his funeral at the London Jewish Community Centre. "[H]e was a gentle soul, compassionate and caring, empathetic and loving."

Rabbi Gottlieb also remembered his friend as "erudite and articulate… he would present even the most challenging ideas and complex arguments in an interesting and engaging fashion."

When Rabbi Wittstein applied for the position in London in 1987, he and his wife Ailene were running a bed-and-breakfast in St. Ignace, Mich., where he made award-winning cinnamon rolls to serve their guests.

A student of Classics and Latin, the rabbi originally studied in Cincinnati to become a teacher. He began his rabbinic studies in Israel in the early 1960s, but would not complete them until 1975. After the stint in Israel, he studied on a Fulbright Scholarship in Greece, where he taught high school English before returning to Cincinnati to eventually become a Jewish educator.

Serving at the city's Isaac M. Wise Temple, he met – and hired – Ailene, also a Jewish educator. They married in 1981, a second marriage for both. The same year, they moved to West Bloomfield, Mich., where they worked at Temple Israel before moving to the northern part of the state and opening their bed and breakfast.

As a couple, they had travelled across North America doing seminars for Reform Jewish educators. Rabbi Gottlieb, who met them in 1980 at a conference, said they were highly regarded for their creativity and dynamism.

For his doctorate in education at the University of Cincinnati, Rabbi Wittstein researched moral development in early childhood. He also completed his rabbinic studies in Cincinnati, at Hebrew Union College.

But he didn't pursue a congregational career until later, continuing to devote the next few years to Jewish education.

It wasn't until they were living in St. Ignace that Rabbi Wittstein "fell in love with that whole role" of serving a congregation, after being asked to fill in for a colleague at an Orthodox synagogue in Sault Ste. Marie, Ailene told The CJN.

Karen Ross, who now lives in Toronto, chaired the committee that hired Rabbi Wittstein for what would become Temple Israel, a fledgling congregation known at the time as the London Jewish Family Association. Under Rabbi Wittstein's leadership, it grew from 40 families to 140.

Ross, who became a family friend, recalls an "immediate connection" the first time she spoke to the rabbi, based on their shared passion for Reform Judaism. "He just seemed very easy to talk to, totally unpretentious… He was not a chatty person at all, but if you asked him a question, you got a really knowledgeable, well thought-out answer."

Rabbi Michal Shekel, who has been serving as the temple's interim rabbi since last year, said Rabbi Wittstein was "quite a force in that community. He was a man of integrity and a fabulous role model."

Rabbi Wittstein leaves his wife Ailene, sons Eric and Ilan Wittstein, of Brooklyn and Baltimore respectively; Eric and Jonathan Avner, of Cincinnati and Austin, Texas, respectively, and five grandchildren.

Comedian explores new worlds through improv

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Lauren Stein has created a new world. Its inhabitants can travel through time, fly planes, shop for ground bull meat and drift through upside-down universes.

All without leaving the stage.

Stein, 25, teaches and performs improv in Toronto. Through her private improv classes, she has created a special dimension deep within the city, where each student must choose a new name and a new identity.

"You become your best self. It gives us that freedom to play," she said.

> 'This is Toronto's art form, more than ballet, more than opera'

Stein's best self is named Thelle. She was born last March, when Stein started teaching improv in Toronto. But in reality, Thelle has been a part of Stein since she was five years old.

"I've been acting my whole life. At five, I did a shul play," she said. "That was a ton of fun. I've been doing drama non-stop."

Stein studied acting at Trinity Guildhall in London, England, and later worked as an assistant teacher in the program. Although the school didn't focus on comedy, it did give Stein a taste of improv.

"I've always been random. I was always in improv, I didn't know that there was an art form that was just improv," she said.

Stein, a graduate of the University of Guelph's drama program, first taught improv while in Hawaii in the summer of 2008. That October, she started taking courses at Impatient Theatre Co., a Toronto improv theatre company.

Last August, she was put on an incubator improv team, which is the first of three team levels.

After the first level, performers can advance to the Herald, which is a three-scene improvisation performance, and then on to the house team, the highest level at Impatient Theatre.

"When I looked into this, I realized, yes, this is my passion. This is what I was meant to be," she said. "When I go back to a play, they're [rehearsing] the same scene. I'm like, 'How do you do that?'" she said.

For Stein, improv is about exploration.

"You start out with an initiation. You're exploring this world. You just go further, and you reach the limits of this world," she said. "There are no mistakes. Everything that happens is meant to happen. Everything is right."

Improv is about taking simple concepts and creating intricate dimensions, Stein said. A character who doesn't know his name could turn into a 30-minute scene.

"We take [it] to a ridiculous height. And funny things will happen," she said. "'What's your name?' 'Um, I don't know.' That can be explored until the world ends."

Apart from her private classes, Stein also held improv workshops for the B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO) and worked with children at the Jewish Family and Child's Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre.

"I'm so involved in the Jewish community, that's where I meet a lot of [students]," she said, adding that improv is a good way of exploring Jewish themes and studying the Torah.

While performing improv, Stein enjoys the unique connection she can create with the audience.

"You're breaking the fourth wall. The audience is a part of the show," she said. "It's a different vibe. The audience informs what you do."

But not everything works on stage.

"Everybody has bad sets. I try not to panic, or try and redeem it," she said. "Improv doesn't always have to be funny. But sometimes you feel [it's a bad set] and that's the worst thing."

This is a risk Toronto audiences have to take, Stein said.

"People don't want to spend a night not knowing if it's going to be the best thing ever. But it is," she said. "This is Toronto's art form, more than ballet, more than opera."

Lauren Stein

While Toronto is filled with improv comedians, few get paid for performing. As a comedian and a teacher, Stein has made it her mission to spread the art form through her city.

Stein, second from right, and other fellow improvers performed at the St. Joseph's Street Festival last summer. From left are Caitlin Chu, Daniel Tseng, Derek Ensoll, Stein, and Micah Vernon.

"The thing I'm finding hardest is that most people haven't heard of improv. They're like, 'Yoga we know. Come to us with yoga.' Within 10 years, everybody will do improv... I'm willing to take that on as my mission," she said.

"I like local art a lot, it's the greatest thing to be able to create that art."

Stein spent the last few summers doing just that. In the summers of 2007 and 2008, she organized a theatre festival and then a film festival, both called Random Thoughts Come Alive, that showed off local work.

Stein also co-wrote, co-produced and co-directed a web show called Starving Artist, which follows a group of poor artists who live together. When one becomes famous, he decides to hide his success from his friends.

"It was so much fun to make something and have it posted," she said, adding that only several episodes made it up. "We rented equipment, but we couldn't get someone to edit it for free."

Stein may still be climbing the comedic ladder in Toronto, but she knows where she wants to be.

"I would really love to spend my life performing and teaching," she said.

Quebec biotech firm makes deal with Israelis

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — A Montreal-based manufacturer of antimicrobial products has struck a deal with an Israeli company to distribute its products in that country.

Noveko International Inc. has concluded an agreement with the biotechnology firm Zer Hitech for exclusive distribution of its antimicrobial masks and respirators, air-filtration and purification systems and hand sanitizers for the next three years.

Noveko, which was founded in 2002, has a patent on the antimicrobial technology it developed.

Joe Hiess, Noveko's vice-president for strategic alliances, said Israel's interest in importing such products is noteworthy in light of the country's international leadership in biotechnology.

Zer Hitech has a contract with the Israeli health-care products company Sarel to supply the Noveko masks to health-care establishments throughout Israel. Sarel acts as the official purchaser for the Israeli Ministry of Health.

The Noveko air filters, which are biodegradable, are to be installed in a Tel Aviv hospital, the company said.

"We are convinced that Noveko's advanced patented technologies are a unique, major breakthrough helping to provide a healthier and safer environment," stated Zer Hitech senior vice-president Uri Zer.

Noveko, whose chair and chief executive officer is André Leroux, is a public company listed on the Toronto Stock Exchange.

The agreement between Noveko and Zer Hitech comes at a time when the Quebec and Israeli governments are actively encouraging greater economic ties.

In September 2008, then-Quebec economic development minister Raymond Bachand and his Israeli counterpart signed an agreement in Jerusalem to strengthen economic and technological co-operation. It was the culmination of an economic mission to Israel led by Bachand, which included Quebec businesspeople, investors and researchers, intended to promote trade, investment and collaboration.

Israel satisfied with Ban's report on Goldstone

JTA

JERUSALEM — UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon's report to the General Assembly "reflected accurately" Israel's response to the Goldstone report on the Gaza war of 2008-09, the Foreign Ministry said.

"This Israeli document expresses Israel's full commitment to carry out credible independent investigations that meet the standards of international law," the Foreign Ministry said in a statement released shortly after the General Assembly's meeting last Friday on the status of the implementation of the recommendations set out by the fact-finding mission headed by Judge Richard Goldstone.

The statement continued: "Despite the difficult combat conditions against Hamas terrorism in Gaza, Israel took care to respect international norms and will continue to do so in the future while maintaining its foremost commitment to protecting the security and well-being of its own citizens."

In his report submitted to the General Assembly last Friday, Ban said Israel had responded to every allegation made against it. He said it was too early to determine whether Israel and the Palestinian Authority had implemented the recommendations, since investigations were ongoing.

Ban did not offer his opinion on whether the investigations were independent and conformed to international standards, as required by Goldstone.

The General Assembly in November called on both Israel and Palestinian groups to investigate alleged war crimes enumerated in the Goldstone report. The assembly threatened to turn over the cases to international courts if the sides did not undertake the investigations properly.

The Palestinian Authority set up a commission of inquiry and provided Ban with preliminary findings, according to reports. The PA has no authority in Gaza, which is run by Hamas.

Hamas responded to Goldstone by saying it did not target Israeli civilians, reports indicated.

The Israeli military conducted an in-depth investigation into its conduct and last week provided Ban with a response that included a point-by-point refutation of Goldstone's charges.

Toyota to recall 32,000 cars in Israel

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Importers of Toyota in Israel said Sunday that there are more than 32,000 Israeli car owners who need a faulty accelerator pedal fixed.

The importers are currently drawing up a list of all the models and chassis numbers of the cars affected, and will recall the vehicles once the relevant parts arrive from abroad.

Union Motors, Israel's official Toyota importer, has pledged that relevant garages will be open for extended hours in order to facilitate the repair process.

The repair will not involve replacing the gas pedal, but will include placing a small metal rod to prevent the pedal from being worn down and breaking, which will then keep the accelerator from sticking, and causing the car to speed out of control. The service will take about two hours, and – of course – will be free.

The problem with the cars is widespread, and so far Toyota has recalled some eight million vehicles worldwide.

PM's son wins Bible Quiz

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's youngest child won the Jerusalem district Bible quiz Feb. 3. Avner Netanyahu, 15, will represent Jerusalem public schools in the national Bible Quiz later this year. He scored 98 out of 100 to defeat 50 opponents. His mother, Sara, has three older brothers who have won the national quiz and her father is an expert in Bible study. Benjamin and Sara Netanyahu have two sons, and he has a daughter from a previous marriage.

Kinneret rises

Lake Kinneret water level has risen by some 34 inches since November. The measurement was the first since Water Authority workers returned to work Jan. 31 after a two-month strike, and follows the largest January rainfall in five years. Another 15 feet would bring the lake to capacity.

Berlusconi addresses MKs

The Goldstone report "tried to incriminate Israel for its justified response to Hamas rockets," Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi said. Berlusconi addressed Israel's Knesset on Feb. 3, the final day of his three-day visit to Israel, during which he and seven of his ministers held a joint cabinet meeting with Israel's cabinet. Berlusconi noted in his address the strong ties between Jerusalem and Rome, saying that "Italy is like a big brother to Israel."

Retaliation for barrel bombs

Israel attacked two Gaza smuggling tunnels in response to Hamas' attempts to attack Israeli targets in the Mediterranean Sea. The air force destroyed two tunnels on Feb. 2 used by Hamas in southern Gaza. One was used to bring terrorists into Israel and the other for smuggling weapons, the IDF said. Three Gazans were injured in the attack, Palestinian reports said. On Feb. 3, a third explosives-laden barrel washed up on the beach at Palmachim, in central Israel. Two others washed up Feb.1 on beaches in Ashdod and Ashkelon, while others reportedly exploded in the sea the previous Friday. Police patrolled beaches looking for more bombs and urged the public to be alert for suspicious objects. A spokesperson for a Gaza group linked to Hamas said there were still many unexploded barrel bombs in the sea. He said they aimed to avenge the assassination last month of Hamas operative Mahmoud al-Mabhouh in a Dubai hotel. Hamas accuses Israel of the murder.

U.K. Jews weigh fight after 'Who is a Jew' court ruling

By WINSTON PICKETT
JTA

LONDON — To fight or not to fight?

That question has bitterly divided the Jewish community in Britain following a Supreme Court ruling late last year striking down a Jewish school's policy of limiting admission to the children of Jewish mothers.

The ruling, which said state-funded Jewish schools can't award places on the basis of whether a student's parent is Jewish because it contravenes Britain's Race Relations Act, went beyond forcing an expansion of admissions criteria to children whose Jewish identity is a matter of dispute between Orthodox and non-Orthodox Jews.

By detaching Jewishness from Jewish legal criteria, whether Orthodox or Reform, it opened up the possibility that non-Jews could qualify for admission. It also introduced the idea that the government, rather than Jewish religious authorities, can determine who is Jewish in Britain.

"This case had nothing to do with denominations or conversions," Britain's chief rabbi, Jonathan Sacks, wrote in London's Jewish Chronicle. "It focused on one simple fact: that Jewish identity is – conversions aside – conferred by birth, by the mother, or in the case of liberal Judaism, by the father if the mother is not Jewish."

The mid-December ruling struck down those interpretations of Jewish identity and introduced its own, he said.

British Jews across the denominational spectrum have viewed the ruling with alarm as government intrusion into religion.

But a debate has erupted within the Jewish community over how to respond, exposing deep fault lines in the community and fuelling Britain's "Who is a Jew?" debate.

For now, the umbrella organization for British Jewry, the Board of Deputies, has decided to take a wait-and-see approach on how the ruling will play out. Leaders of non-Orthodox movements here have praised the stance, but Orthodox leaders are unsatisfied.

"We were deeply concerned that a change in legislation is not being actively pursued," said the rabbinical council of the United Synagogue, Britain's mainstream Orthodox movement.

The debate started with the case of a Jewishly observant 12-year-old boy, identified in court papers as "M," whose father is Jewish and whose mother is a convert to Judaism through the Reform movement.

The boy applied to the state-supported JFS school, a flagship of North London's Jewish community founded in 1732 as the Jews' Free School. The school, which has some 1,900 students, rejected M on the grounds that he isn't Jewish according to Halachah, which says only those born to a Jewish mother or a woman who converted to Orthodox Judaism is considered Jewish.

Britain has 7,000 state-supported parochial schools, including some 50 Jewish ones. Under the law, schools can favour applicants from their own faiths using criteria set by a designated religious authority.

But M's family sued, saying the school discriminated against him. The family lost, but the ruling was overturned by the Court of Appeals. Ultimately the case reached Britain's new Supreme Court, which ratified the Appeals Court decision in a 5-4 ruling, saying that basing school admission on whether one's mother is Jewish is by definition discriminatory and in violation of the 1976 Race Relations Act.

The decision has divided British Jews.

On one side are the Orthodox, who urged early intervention by seeking an amendment to legislation that would nullify the court's decision and re-establish Halachah – and with it, the primacy of Orthodoxy – as the determining criterion for school admission.

On the other side are non-Orthodox movements, who said they'd support a change in legislation only if their converts will be accepted into mainstream Orthodox schools. These movements were pleased the court ruling struck a blow against Orthodox dominance of religious matters even as they were alarmed by the government's level of meddling in Jewish religious matters.

To articulate a unified Jewish response to the ruling, the Board of Deputies set up a consultative committee with representatives from the various denominations, with the exception of haredim, who generally attend Jewish schools that don't get state funds. The effort to forge a consensus Jewish position failed, however, and a default approach was adopted: wait and see how the ruling affects the community, "then consider what kind of amendment we need rather than rush into it," said Board of Deputies president Vivian Wineman. "Everyone felt it sensible to wait."

Meanwhile, JFS and other state-funded Jewish schools have changed their admissions criteria, which now focus on requiring applicants to show participation in faith-based activities, such as shul attendance, which Rabbi Sacks characterized as "a Christian solution for a Jewish school."

Socio-economic gap between Israeli Jews, Arabs widening

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Socio-economic gaps between Jews and Arabs in Israel are widening, says Sikkuy, the Association for the Advancement of Civic Equality in Israel.

In a conference call with reporters from Canada and the United States, Sikkuy's co-directors, Ron Gerlitz and Ali Haider, called on the Israeli government to close them as soon as possible.

"We want to achieve full equality between Jewish and Palestinian citizens in Israel, which is possible," said Haider, an Israeli Arab.

The fissures are growing due to unfair government allocations in health, housing, education, social welfare and employment, he noted.

Gerlitz, a Jew, cited "discriminatory policies" by Israel to account for the fact that Israeli Arabs don't enjoy full equality with their fellow Jewish citizens.

An Arab child born in Israel today will typically be raised in a poorer family, attend a school that is less properly equipped than one in the Jewish sector and find it harder to get a job, he said.

According to data released by the Central Bureau of Statistics in December, 1.5 million Arabs live in Israel, comprising 20.3 per cent of its population.

Robert Walker, director of communications at Israel's embassy in Ottawa, said: "Equality is a core value in Israel, and while there are still challenges, Israel is committed to eliminating gaps between different groups, whether economic, social or educational."

He added that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu appointed Labor party MK Avishay Braverman to the post of minister of minority affairs, thereby demonstrating that Israel "takes this challenge very seriously."

Judging by Sikkuy's latest Jewish-Arab equality index, containing data for 2008, inequality continues to fester, much to the detriment of Israel's Arab minority. The situation has worsened across the board in all areas except education funding, Sikkuy reported.

In health, there has been a seven per cent increase in the inequality gap. In housing, employment and social welfare, the comparable figures are roughly five per cent, three per cent and 11 per cent respectively.

But in education, the inequality gap has decreased by almost five per cent.

Urging Israel to come up with a clear strategy to wipe out existing gaps, Haider charged that the current Israeli government, headed by Netanyahu, hasn't even bothered to lay out its plans for the Arab sector.

"This sends a bad message," he said, claiming this is the first time that an Israeli government has not presented a plan to improve conditions in the Arab community.

Warning that the gaps are multiplying at an alarming rate, Gerlitz said that Netanyahu's predecessor, Ehud Olmert, took preliminary steps to deal with the deteriorating situation.

He tempered his criticism by acknowledging that some government officials are ready to change the status quo.

Gerlitz pointed out that gaps are accentuated when Jewish philanthropic funds in the Diaspora are channelled solely to Israeli Jews rather than apportioned on an equal basis.

"In the struggle for justice and equality, funds should help all Israelis," he declared.

Saying that many unemployed Arab university graduates want to join the labour force, Haider admitted that some jobs are simply unattainable to Arabs due to security reasons and locale.

Only 18 per cent of Arab women, as opposed to more than 50 per cent of Jewish women, are gainfully employed, he said.

Jessica Balaban, executive director of the Inter Agency Task Force on Israeli Arab Issues, said that 13,000 Arab youths who don't serve in the armed forces are currently working as volunteers in alternative national service programs, while many more are waiting to join.

"Seventy seven per cent of Arab youths want to be community volunteers," she added.

Alluding to the fact that most Israeli Arabs refrain from enlisting in the military and are thereby not eligible for certain state benefits, Haider said there should be no connection between duties and rights.

Complaining that Israel practices double standards, Haider said that while haredi Jews don't usually join the army, they're still not denied such benefits.

Sikkuy, founded in 1991 as a Jewish-Arab advocacy organization, is a non-partisan, non-profit, non-governmental group whose goal is to advance equality in Israel in terms of government budgets, resource allocation, hiring policy, land usage and access to government services.

New Israel Fund targeted in ad

JTA

WASHINGTON — Christians United for Israel (CUFI) objected to an advertisement run by a group it funds that depicted the president of the New Israel Fund (NIF) wearing a horn.

"Although we are often demonized by our critics, CUFI never demonizes those with whom we disagree, and we object when anyone does," CUFI spokesperson Ari Morgenstern told JTA.

The ad, run by Im Tirtzu, an Israeli right-wing grassroots group, attempts to link the New Israel Fund to the Goldstone report, the UN Human Rights Council investigation last year that charged Israel with war crimes in the Gaza Strip during its military operation last winter.

"Without the New Israel Fund, there could be no Goldstone report and Israel would not be facing international accusations of war crimes," says the ad, illustrated by a cartoon of Naomi Chazan, NIF's president, sporting a horn and a predatory grin.

Im Tirtzu has singled out 16 groups from among the hundreds NIF funds as having contributed to Goldstone's inquiry. NIF has denied funding one of the groups.

John Hagee Ministries, founded by the pastor who also founded CUFI, donated a total of $200,000 to Im Tirtzu in 2008 and 2009, citing its pledge toward "public advocacy on behalf of the State of Israel and of Zionism on campuses," Morgenstern said.

Hagee Ministries did not have advance knowledge of the campaign, he said. A number of liberal pro-Israel groups have decried the ad and other attacks on NIF and human rights groups in Israel.

Asked whether Hagee Ministries would continue to fund Im Tirtzu, he would say only that "all activities of organizations have an impact on" the process of deciding which groups to fund.

Iran hijacks Herzliya Conference agenda

By HERSHELL EZRIN
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

The subject of Iran hijacked the agenda at the recent Herzliya Conference on the balance of Israel's national security.

Strategic and military experts from across the globe shared a deep-seated concern about Iran at the conference, Jan. 31 to Feb. 3. That concern, about Iran's nuclear intentions and capabilities and the imminent threat, not just to the Middle East but also to global stability and security, was repeated by Israeli and international politicians.

Israeli President Shimon Peres set the stage for the need for global action with his references to Iranian plans for hegemony. "Walking like emperors, they believe that who controls the Middle East controls the world," Peres said. He spoke about the moral corruption of the Iranian regime, a state whose leaders deny the Holocaust, finance terrorism and perpetrate human rights violations against their own people.

Iran is a "source of evil to the state of Israel, the security of the Arab world and to the values of the broader democratic world," he said. He called for the widest possible coalition to impose tough economic sanctions as well as co-ordinated support for the struggle in Iran against the regime.

The sense that dealing with Iran has become the preoccupation of most international policy-makers prevailed at the conference. Several U.S. and EU policy-makers explained the rationale for concerted international action: wherever you look, you see the hand of Iranian intervention, from support for the Iraqi insurgents and Afghanistan rebels battling western troops and undermining the Pakistani regime, to the exporting of terror through their involvement with Hamas and Hezbollah. Iran's influence also extends to the shores of the Western Hemisphere, where it had established a presence in guiding the Chavez regime in Venezuela.

The emergence of a Shia Iranian bomb would likely lead to the breakdown of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and the development of a Sunni nuclear response, Peres said.

Even those countries critical of Israeli policies toward the Palestinians took unequivocal aim at the threat of Iran. Spanish Foreign Minister Miguel Moratinos said that securing Iran's compliance with UN Security Council resolutions is a high priority, and that diplomatically confronting Iran could bring together moderate Arab states.

Ron Asmus, a former senior State Department official, summarized the thinking about Iran at the Herzliya Conference, saying that "Iran brings everything to the forefront," including NATO policies in defence of allies.

Retired German general Klaus Naumann, who headed NATO's military committee from 1996 to 1999, stated that NATO's extended deterrence would be the first provision to be put to the test by a nuclear Iran. "We have to guarantee [the security of] those who feel dominated by a nuclear Iran," he said.

The consensus at the conference was that Iran has been accelerating its efforts to produce nuclear weapons. Expectations are that Iran will achieve the nuclear bomb threshold, including critical ignition testing, in the months ahead.

Because of Iranian longer-range ballistic missile capabilities, strong action starting with deeper sanctions must be taken by countries, including Canada, to restrict and pressure the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps, who are the bulwark maintaining the current regime in power. Naumann said that "2,000-kilometre ballistic missiles only make sense as delivery systems for weapons of mass destruction. There is no other military value for them."

Hershell Ezrin is the CEO of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy.

Israeli ceramics exhibit explores identity and architecture

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

By no coincidence, many of the pieces in "From the Melting Pot into the Fire," the new exhibition of Israeli ceramics at the Gardiner Museum, turn on two themes – identity and architecture.

Israel, a Jewish but multicultural state composed of Jews, Muslims and Christians, is a work in progress, as evidenced by its changing urban landscapes.

If there is one nation in the world where construction cranes are an ever-present reality, it is surely Israel.

The country a tourist may have visited in 1967 has been transformed by waves of new immigrants, particularly from the former Soviet Union, and by a series of building booms.

Taking their cue from the changes in their midst, Israeli ceramicists have produced works that reflect the sheer diversity of the country's citizenry and the evolving nature of its cities.

The 37 stylized, highly conceptual works at the Gardiner Museum, the exhibition's only Canadian venue, explore such issues as land and home in modern Israel.

"It is an outstanding selection of contemporary studio ceramics we believe demonstrates the diversity of experience among the presenting artists," said Charles Manson, the museum's chief curator.

He added, "The union of ideas and culture makes Israel a centre of a vibrant ceramics scene."

"From the Melting Pot into the Fire," which opened Feb. 4 and runs until May 9, is organized by the Ceramic Artists Association of Israel, a non-governmental, non-profit professional organization.

The Building Blocks of Memory/Monument for the Hebrew Language.

Its representative, Yael Novak, was at a press preview last week, as was one of her installations.

Funding to bring the exhibition to Canada was provided by Israel's ministry of foreign affairs, which has launched a public relations campaign to de-emphasize politics and strife in the portrayal of Israel.

Prior to its arrival in Toronto, the exhibition was at the Mint Museum of Craft + Design in Charlotte, N.C.

The important theme of identity is explored in a number of visually striking ceramics.

The Building Blocks of Memory/Monument for the Hebrew Language, by Avner Singer and Varda Bar Shamai, unfolds in the letters of the alphabet and in visual images of historic figures such as Theodor Herzl, the founder of political Zionism.

My Melting Pot is by Brazilian immigrant Martha Riegner, who was raised as a Jew despite the fact that one of her parents is a Catholic. Riegner's work consists of three white and blue vessels symbolizing the Jewish and Catholic faiths and their influence on her.

Sabras in a Tin Can, by Zipi Geva, conveys the essence of the Israeli people, prickly externally but sweet internally

Anna Kirzner's Free Space resembles an open attache case and represents the invisible borders that surround us all.

Lie of the Land, by Marcelle Klein and Tami Bar-Lev, focuses on the notion of belonging through the medium of an hourglass and falling sand.

Dina Shahar's Urban Tiles dwells on the bold facades of typical Israeli residential buildings.

By means of geometric designs, Efrat Eyal's Model Home evokes a private space within a public space.

Shani Orstav's Out of a Wall a Stone will Cry connects building materials with the human experience, while Orit Ben Arie's Structures links geometric forms with an urban environment.

Ethel Pisareff's Protected Space is about the relationship between inner space and outer layers.

"Each artist and each piece tells a different story," said Alexandra Montgomery, the museum's executive director. "Some are witty, while others are more poignant."

Overall, however, two overpowering themes, identity and architecture, sum up the essence of "From the Melting Pot into the Fire."

Former Facts of Life star sounds simply glorious in operatic play

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Mindy Cohn, best known for playing Natalie on the hit TV show The Facts of Life, is starring in the Peter Quilter comedy Glorious!, at Mississauga's Stage West.

Glorious!, which runs from Feb. 11 to April 16, is based on the true story of Florence Foster Jenkins (1868-1944), a New York socialite with a passion for opera. She was a terrible singer, who performed unbelievably bad recitals to a sold-out Carnegie Hall, leaving her audiences crying with laughter.

"She was the world's worst singer, but Glorious! is really a love story of her friends and her accompanist, Cosme McMoon [played by Justin Stadnyk]," says Cohn. "Florence was this amazing, independent spirit, beautiful woman, and with the support of her friends put on these recitals and performed.

"She thought she sounded glorious, and people just loved her because she had such a joy of life about her. It was infectious and contagious. People just wanted to be around her."

Cohn says that Foster Jenkins' contemporaries and friends included actor Tallulah Bankhead and songwriters Cole Porter and Harold Arlen. Famous musicians and actors appreciated her spirit, her spunk and her tenacity. She was such an incredible life force, and the fact that she couldn't sing didn't seem to matter.

"The play opens when she meets her new accompanist, Cosme McMoon, and basically Cosme kind of mirrors the audience," says Cohn. "As Cosme first hears her voice – it's like 'the Emperor's New Clothes' – like do we all know this woman can't sing? But the play takes the audience on a journey, and as he falls in love with Florence, so does the audience. Cosme is the hub of the piece, although it is about Florence."

Cohn, unlike Foster Jenkins, can sing, but opera is a whole different animal for her. To learn the songs in the show in only two weeks of rehearsal has been incredibly challenging for her, she says.

Glorious! is a "feel-good play," Cohn says. "No matter what kind of mood you will come to the theatre with, an hour and a half with Florence, Cosme, her friend Dorothy, and her beau, St. Clair... it is just a joy of life.

"I think people will be humming her songs. This play really puts a smile on your face. She's enchanting, and the play is enchanting."

Mindy Cohn plays Florence Foster Jenkins

The Los Angeles-based actor made her acting debut as the witty, outspoken Eastland Academy student Natalie Green on The Facts of Life. Cohn played Rose Jenko in Fox's 21 Jump Street and made appearances on Diff'rent Strokes, Charles in Charge and other shows.

She went on to star on stage and in several films, including Alone with a Stranger and Sex & Death 101. She also co-hosted the radio show Talkzone with Alan Thicke, on which teens discussed issues with their parents.

For the past 12 years, Cohn has been the voice of Velma in the animated series What's New Scooby Doo? She will be appearing in the upcoming film Violet Tendencies.

Her volunteer activities include working for the United Nations.

Cohn was raised Jewish and had a bat mitzvah. "I am very proud to be Jewish, but it is more a cultural thing than a religious thing for me and my family, and always has been," she says.

" It is more about who we are as a people, but it is not the religious path that I follow. It is a slippery slope in the States – a lot of people don't want to say they are Jewish because they are not religious, but I think they are two different things."

For tickets to Glorious!, visit www.stagewest.com or call the box office at 905-238-0042.

Actor faces 18 to Life on CBC sitcom

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Toronto actor Stacey Farber is back on weekly television. The former Degrassi: The Next Generation alumnus is starring in CBC's newest sitcom, 18 to Life. She plays 18-year-old Jessie Hill who marries the boy next door, Tom Bellow (Michael Seater), on a dare!

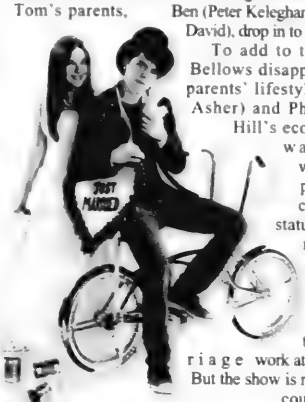
"I absolutely loved the script – that was the first thing that attracted me to the show," Farber said. "The dialogue was hilarious, really original, and I loved the character. Jessie is very different from Ellie Nash, the character I played on Degrassi. I was very happy to have the opportunity to do something different and to do comedy in particular. It's a lot harder than I expected."

Farber grew up on the hit Canadian teen drama series, Degrassi: The Next Generation. At 14, she was cast as Ellie, a teen battling depression, and continued in the role until she turned 21 when she starred in the television movie – Degrassi Goes Hollywood.

Farber, 22, earned a Gemini nomination last year for her performance on the series, but as chance had it, she lost to Seater, her co-star on 18 to Life.

"We were actually in the same category," she recalled. "Michael won for his role on Life with Derek, but that's OK. We went out to celebrate together afterward and it was cool," she recalled.

In 18 to Life, it's not always marital bliss for the newlyweds. Once Jessie and Tom say "I do," they transform the Bellows' attic into a cool loft for two. But it gets crowded up there when Tom's parents, Ben (Peter Keleghan) and Judith (Ellen David), drop in to offer advice.



Stacey Farber plays Jessie Hill alongside co-star Michael Seater, playing Tom.

To add to the humour, the Bellows disapprove of Jessie's parents' lifestyle. Tara (Angela Asher) and Phil (Al Goulem) Hill's eco-friendly, hippy ways don't sit well with Tom's parents who are concerned with status and what other neighbours think.

"Most episodes, Tom and Jessie try to figure out how to make their marriage work at such a young age. But the show is mainly about three couples because the parents have a large role, so it's a mix and match, [depending on] who the episode is about," Farber explained.

In one show, Jessie has issues with her mother-in-law when she finds out that Judith has thrown away invitations to Jessie's stagette because she's embarrassed about the upcoming marriage. In another, Tom's father keeps his conversion to Judaism a secret from his wife, leading to mayhem when their rabbi comes to dinner.

Growing up in Toronto, Farber attended Claude Watson School for the Arts, Branksome Hall and York University, before attending The New School, a college in New York, for three years and interning at trendy New York fashion magazines Nylon and allure, and becoming a blogger at Teen Vogue.

"It was really interesting and fun. I wanted to learn everything I could about that industry and how women's magazines were put together," Farber said. "It was amazing that I could intern for a credit at my school."

Since Farber graduated in May with a BA in creative writing, her plans include travelling, interning and acting. Recently, she was cast in a television movie filmed in Hamilton for MTV, and had a small role on the Season 3 premiere of the police drama Flashpoint, airing in the fall.

"It was very cool to be surrounded by pretend cops who were pointing their guns at me and to work on one of CTV's biggest hits."

18 to Life airs on CBC TV Mondays at 8 p.m. Visit www.cbc.ca to view past episodes.

How Jews fared under Islam and Christianity

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The state of Jewish-Muslim relations has been a contentious topic for a long time now.

Nineteenth-century historians, particularly Jewish ones, claimed that the relationship between Jews and Arabs in the Middle East was more harmonious than the relationship between Jews and Christians in Europe.

Arabs hostile to Zionism and Israel adopted this view in the 20th century.

Writing in the 1930s, George Antonius, a Christian Arab, commented that Arab history remained "remarkably free from instances of deliberate persecution," and that in spite of the Palestine problem, the treatment of Jews in Arab countries "continues to be not less friendly and humane than in England or the United States."

Reacting to such rose-coloured assessments, some Jewish writers in recent times have argued that Jews did not fare well under Islam and that Muslims treated Jews almost as badly as medieval Christianity.

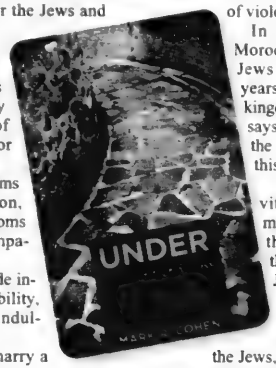
Mark Cohen, a professor of Near Eastern studies at Princeton University, has weighed these diametrically opposing interpretations and, in the second edition of Under Crescent & Cross: The Jews in the Middle Ages, (Princeton University Press), he reaches a middle-of-the-road conclusion

As he puts it, "When all is said and done, the historical evidence indicates that the Jews of Islam, especially during the formative and classical centuries (up to the 13th century), experienced much less persecution than did the Jews of Christendom."

Cohen validates his theory by quoting Bernard Lewis, whose book, Jews of Islam, he rates as "the most balanced assessment of the position of the Jews under Islamic rule in the Middle Ages."

According to Lewis, Jews were generally treated better under Islam than under Christianity, with hostility to Jews in Islamic society being non-ideological.

Taking this as as his starting point, Cohen writes: "Whereas the Christian vocabulary for the Jews and Judaism reflects animosity, Islamic parlance betrays recognition of mutually held religious concepts and values."



Essentially, Jews and non-Muslims in Islamic Arab societies, popularly known as dhimmis, agreed to a host of discriminatory limitations in return for protection.

Cohen maintains that Jews and Muslims enjoyed "easygoing" social interaction, despite friction owing to divergent customs and mores, but that xenophobia accompanied Jewish-Christian relations.

Judaism and Christianity both forbade intermarriage, the ultimate form of sociability, but Islam handled the matter "more indulgently," he adds.

A Muslim man was permitted to marry a dhimmi woman on the presumption that he, as master in the relationship, would not be susceptible to the lure of his wife's religion. Further, Islamic law required the husband to permit his non-Muslim wife to observe her religious rituals and to pray inside their house.

Cohen points out that Jews in Islamic realms did not experience "physical violence on a scale remotely approaching Jewish suffering in western Christendom." As an example, he cites Muslim and Christian reactions to the Black Death.

In Europe, where the Crusades had already ravaged Jewish communities, the Black Death triggered massive pogroms, but in the Islamic world, Jews were not blamed for the plague and pogroms did not occur.

Jews, however, were the target of Muslim outbursts of violence.

In 1032, the Jewish quarter of Fez, Morocco, was sacked by Berbers and 6,000 Jews are said to have been slain. Just 32 years later, the Jews of the Spanish-Berber kingdom of Grenada were massacred. Cohen says that the Berber Almohads perpetrated the most serious crimes against Jews during this period.

Under Christianity, Jews performed vital commercial functions, notably as moneylender and tax collectors. But as the need for their services waned with the rise of a Christian commercial class, Jews were subjected to the whims of local rulers, often with tragic results.

As Cohen observes, "When the time came that rulers saw no further use for the Jews, they confiscated whatever remained of their wealth and expelled them."

Rabbinical attitudes to money lending varied. In ancient Babylonia, Jews were discouraged from charging interest to gentiles. Yet in Europe, from the 12th century onward, rabbis justified usury for a variety of reasons: hard times, the exclusion of Jews from landed occupations, the heavy tax burden, and the need to amass funds to bribe Christians when Jews came under the threat of persecution.

Although Jews were usually worse off under Christianity, they encountered a much more hospitable environment in the southern Mediterranean region of France than in the northern part of Europe.

"Jewish communities in the south experienced much less persecution and over all lived in more placid, integrated fashion with their surroundings than their northern European brethren," Cohen notes. "They were less segregated from Christians, and their economic activities varied."

The Jewish response to persecution differed markedly in Christian and Muslim lands.

Ashkenazi Jews preferred martyrdom to conversion, since they considered Christians theologically idolatrous and were bound by the mishnaic ruling that Jews must die rather than succumb to idolatry. Sephardi Jews, when threatened with death unless they converted, typically accepted Islam rather than martyrdom, Cohen points out.

In summing up, he says that Jews in Islamic areas regularly crossed boundaries to participate, if only temporarily and tenuously, as virtual equals with Muslims. He adds, "Though always at risk of incurring Muslim wrath and even persecution, Jews, nonetheless, enjoyed substantial security during the formative and classical periods of Islam."

Practically speaking, Jews and Muslims in Islamic societies were equal in economic matters. Islamic law demanded that dhimmis remain subordinate in partnerships formed with Muslims, but this edict was often ignored.

As well, Jews did not suffer restrictions on their freedom of movement under Islam.

The situation was different in Europe.

Jewish merchants and traders intensified Christianity's animus toward Jews, while deeply ingrained theological hatred of Jews had a profoundly negative impact on law and policy that only escalated over time.

Under Crescent & Cross, in short, is a useful volume about an extremely sensitive issue.

Biathlete brings passion for success

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

NEW YORK — When the phone call from Germany arrived at the Spector family home in Lenox, Mass., last month, the voice on the other end betrayed little of the excitement one would expect from a newly minted Olympic athlete.

Laura Spector, 22, had qualified for the U.S. biathlon team that will compete in Vancouver. The Games run Feb. 12 to 28.

"It was a very quiet voice, and it was just, 'Daddy, Hi it's Laura. I made the team,'" her father, Jesse, recalled. "It was just like that. It was that quiet, from this five-foot, 100-pound kid. It was probably a very emotional three to five seconds because her voice sounded as though, 'Dad, I didn't make the team.' But she was so composed."

Spector will be the youngest American woman in the biathlon, which combines cross-country skiing with target shooting. She is also one of five athletes measuring in at five-feet tall – the shortest members of the 2010 U.S. Olympic team.

A student of genetics and Jewish studies at Dartmouth College, Spector is among a handful of American Jewish Olympians headed to Vancouver for the 21st Winter Olympics. Chicago native Ben Agosto, a 2006 Olympic silver medalist, is returning to compete in the ice-dancing pairs. Steve Mesler, a bobsledder from Buffalo, N.Y., is back for his third Olympics.

Israel will have a team of three in Vancouver: Mikail Renzhin, an alpine skier originally from Latvia, and the brother-sister duo Alexandra and Roman Zaretsky, born in Belarus, who compete in ice dancing.

The pair finished seventh in the 2010 European Championships, which earned them an Olympic berth. They are scheduled to skate to Hava Nagila and music from Schindler's List. It's their second Olympics. Renzhin will compete in the slalom and giant slalom events. It's also his second Olympics.

Agosto, 28, who nearly missed the 2006 Olympics because his partner, the Canadian-born skater Tanith Belbin, was not yet a naturalized U.S. citizen, said he was looking forward to soaking in the atmosphere of what will almost certainly be his last Olympics. A last-minute act of Congress granted Belbin expedited citizenship and she was able to represent the United States at the Games in Turin, Italy.

"When that came through, it was really a big surprise, but we really didn't have that time to build up and kind of think of what to expect," Agosto told JTA by phone from his training rink in Pennsylvania. "We were just kind of thrown into it. There's a lot that I don't remember because it was such a whirlwind."

Spector grew up on a farm in Lenox where her family keeps llamas, alpacas, goats, horses, sheep, turkeys and chickens. She does her academic work during the spring and summer to free up the fall and winter for training and competition.

In high school, she would wake before the sun to make tracks on her skis in a field behind the family home. She discovered biathlon at a camp for the sport in Lake Placid, N.Y., when she was 14.

"It was my first experience with shooting a gun, but I loved combining two sports – cross-country skiing (in this case running because it was summer time) and marksmanship – to make each a little more challenging," Spector wrote in an e-mail. "Therefore, the greater the reward when you do well."

Her parents describe her as an unusually precocious and passionate kid who, from a young age, was adept at meeting challenges.

"She's not a frivolous kid," said Spector's mother, Patty, herself a national champion in marathon canoe racing. "Even when she's on the road and travelling, she reads books that most people her age would never go near or pick up. She just finished The Gulag Archipelago."

When she became a bat mitzvah at the Conservative Congregation Knesset Israel Synagogue in nearby Pittsfield, where her family has been members for 30 years, Spector conducted the entire Shabbat service in keeping with the shul's tradition of lay-led services. Spector also attended the synagogue's Hebrew school.

"For me, being Jewish is a lot about family and community, and the continuity of tradition," Spector said. "There is an entire congregation at home responsible for the shaping of my religious and cultural identity. There is comfort in knowing that these are people who have known me since I was born and have instilled in me thousands of years of tradition in ethical behavior."

Though generally considered a minor sport by Americans, biathlon is wildly popular in Europe and is said to be the continent's top-rated televised winter sport. Patty Spector compares it to NASCAR racing in the United States.

The Spectors have watched their daughter perform in stadiums packed with thousands of fans in Europe, and they will be in Vancouver to cheer on Laura and the other U.S. athletes. "What Jewish mother would not go see their daughter?" Patty said.

Riefenstahl footage from Berlin withdrawn

JTA

VANCOUVER — The organizers of the Vancouver Winter Olympics have withdrawn an official video of archival footage from Leni Riefenstahl's film of the 1936 Olympics in Berlin.

It was withdrawn after Canadian Jewish Congress and others reportedly complained about the doctored footage.

The four-minute video, Lights Will Guide You Home, has been screened for months to participants in the Olympic torch relay after they boarded shuttle buses to their positions along its route. The video was also posted on the Vancouver organizing committee's website.

The Globe and Mail reported recently what had long been noted on YouTube: That the archival footage is from Olympia, Riefenstahl's controversial film of the Olympic flame being lit in Greece and carried to Berlin.

Reports noted that the segment was edited to avoid, among other things, the runners passing between two Nazi flags. A shot of the torch bearer entering the Olympic stadium in Berlin was digitally altered to remove a number of silhouetted arms in Nazi salutes.

Riefenstahl made propaganda films for Adolf Hitler, most notably Triumph of the Will.

"Couldn't they find another 22 seconds of footage to use? To many members of our community, the entire 1936 Games – and all related images are rooted in hate," Romy Ritter, Congress' Pacific region director told the New York Times.

Jim Richards, program director for the torch relay, said the video was being replaced with new footage of highlights from the current torch relay. But he defended the use of footage from Olympia, saying its producers considered three options: not using the footage, altering it or using it in its original form.

"We chose the middle ground, in order to respect the relay's history, while not highlighting the political environment of the day," he said in a statement quoted in the Times. "We weighed the decision carefully, as even though the Berlin 1936 Games footage lasts only a few seconds, we wanted to try to do the right thing to reflect the relay's past."

New kids' soccer league unveiled

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It never rains but it pours, at least when it comes to sports leagues for Jewish children.

Last fall, the Prosserman JCC and its partner JCC Chai Sports launched a series of sports leagues to involve elementary-aged kids in extra-curricular athletic activities. Hockey, soccer, baseball and basketball are among the JCC's offerings.

Now, a pair of soccer aficionados are announcing the start of a new non-profit soccer league to kick off in May that is aimed primarily at children attending Jewish day schools.

The Maccabi Toronto Academy will trade on the success of the adult soccer team bearing the same Maccabi name, employ its coaches and players, and add training clinics, kosher food, family activities, pick-up games and a venue at a north Toronto day school as selling points as it enters the market.

Capping it off is the opportunity for some of the players to exhibit their skills during halftime at an Ontario Soccer League game at Esther Shiner Stadium, said Jason Mausberg, one of the principals behind Maccabi Toronto's new Jewish day school program, along with Martin Scott.

Mausberg said he got the idea for a Jewish soccer league while accompanying his seven-year-old son, who attends the Toronto Heschel School, to local house league games. It turned out, many of the other parents also had children in day schools.

At the same time, Mausberg realized he could leverage his association with the Maccabi Toronto soccer team, where he serves as a player and coach. He saw there was room for some sort of sporting synthesis that would see creation of a Jewish house league under the guidance of Maccabi personnel, who would coach and run clinics.

Adding value to the enterprise are plans for various activities to keep younger and older siblings busy while their brothers and sisters are playing league games.

His dream is to have kids play for their school teams, although the league won't turn away Jewish children from public schools.

"Our hope is to create greater identification with sport within the Jewish day school environment, to provide a warmer environment for children to participate where they will come to the field already knowing their classmates, to enable friendships and acquaintances to flourish… and to create pride within the Jewish community in our accomplishments by introducing our children to elite Jewish athletes and coaches who compete at the highest levels," said Scott.

The spring league will kick off on May 1 at the fields at Heschel school and run for eight weeks. Cost per player is $180. Grades 1 and 2 will play on Tuesday evenings from 6:15 to 7:45, and grades 3 and 4 will play on Thursdays from 6:15 to 7:45. In addition, the academy is offering pick-up soccer on Sundays (9:30 to 11:30), which includes games for kids, parents and even games involving parents and kids at the same time.

There is room for 120 kids on 12 teams, six per age group. So far, more than 35 people have registered.

Mausberg said the Maccabi Toronto soccer club includes skilled players from Israel, Peru, Mexico, England, India, Russia and Morocco, among others. The team's technical director, Boris Krimus, played professionally in Israel and Moldova, and has a National "B" license certification.

The team formed the nucleus of the master's and open (adult) teams that participated in the Maccabiah Games in Israel last summer. The open team advanced to the quarterfinals before bowing out.

On the domestic scene, Maccabi Toronto has won the Division I indoor soccer title at the Hangar Indoor Recreational Facility for six of the past seven years.

This year they are slated to enter the highly competitive Ontario Soccer League, but under the banner – for the first year, at least – of the North York Hearts.

The move allows them to offer some of the kids the opportunity to show their stuff during halftime of OSL games, Mausberg said.

Inside Back

I'll be right over

NEW TO CANADA
By NINA SHENHAV

When you invite me over, I'll be the first guest to say my goodbyes. It's not that I don't love you or don't appreciate visiting your home, it's just that I'm afraid to breathe someone else's air – and no, my friends, it wouldn't help to assure me that I'm more than welcome. It's got to do with my miserable childhood. I promise we'll talk about it some other time.

Anyway, the world is populated by a number of different types of houseguests.

The guest who came to sleep: By the horrible moniker, you can imagine the type. In his defence, I must mention that he arrives late, but that's why he feels the need to stay the latest. He watches from the sofa as the almost-last-guest leaves, while you, with a frozen smile, stand at the open door.

You might even mumble "My, my, how time flies when you're having fun, it's after midnight…"

Your guest will stretch his legs and say, "It is late. I'm falling asleep myself!"

Just when you start feeling the joy of life again, you notice he's making your couch comfortable by rearranging the pillows.

Well, things aren't as bad as they seem. They're worse.

When you're done washing the dishes, vacuuming and showering, he looks at you in your pyjamas and suggests: "So, how about another round of coffee?"

The "I brought my own food" guest: He doesn't want to intrude. He came because you forced him to. He sits on the edge of the couch the whole evening and hardly touches the food (let alone takes seconds).

Sometimes, he even brings most of his dinner with him. Not to offend you, God forbid, but just to chip in.

When, for some mysterious reason, no one talks around the dinner table – people just quietly chew their food – he gets up in a hurry to leave. If you'd like him to stay, be extremely careful when scratching your hands or just lifting them up. He may think you're looking at your watch and want him out, or (in extreme cases) want to hit him for coming.

The "open up my present now!" guest: When you open the door to greet him, you see a present first, and only after a couple of minutes do you get to see him. He's all smiles and making a great fuss about his gift. You want to introduce him to the other guests? Forget about it. You ask him to join the others? Not interested.

Look, he bought you a present, and you and the rest of the world should look at it now! (And it's almost always a nothing-to-write-home-about gift.) Throughout the evening, he returns to the scene of crime (the gift zone), fumbles it and dances around it over and over.

Mind you, he's better than the "I didn't know what to get you, so I got you nothing" guest. You might as well say, "I didn't know what to cook for you, so I cooked you nothing."

The best guest, ever: He calls you up the day before and says in a very sorry voice: "Would you mind changing plans? I'd simply love for you to come over, instead of me coming to your place. I want you to taste my new posh recipes, and please don't bring anything. Your company is the greatest gift!"

And for those of you readers who know me, please, do take it personally.

Exercise slows dementia and Alzheimer's

FITNESS CORNER
By FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

We have known for several years that a healthy diet rich in omega-3 fats and brain-stimulating activities such as reading, playing a musical instrument or bridge helps prevent dementia and Alzheimer's.

Four recent studies from Canada, Germany and the United States found that exercise not only strengthens your body, but it also protects and improves brain function. Exercise increases the number of capillaries in the brain and stimulates the production of the brain-derived chemical neurotrophic factor (BDNF). This protein helps support the survival of existing neurons and encourages the growth of new ones. This is vital to learning, long-term memory and higher thinking.

Genetics plays a small part in the health and wellness of our minds as we age. Our environment and lifestyle choices are essential in maintaining a healthy body and sharp mind. Resistance training twice a week improved attention spans and conflict resolution skills in woman over 60, while lowering the risk of chronic diseases. Cardio-based exercises such as brisk walking, aerobics, ballroom dancing and swimming lowers your risk of cognitive and mental impairment up to 39 per cent. Ballroom dancing has the largest effect on the brain, lowering the risk of developing dementia by 63 per cent later in life, as it takes a lot of mental effort to dance.

Regular aerobic activity has been shown to improve the ability to multitask and process information efficiently, even in people with mild cognitive and mental impairment. A separate study out of Israel found that even starting an exercise program in your 80s will extend your life and your ability to live independently. This study found that seniors who were active in their 70s were more likely to remain independent when they reached 85.

Seniors who keep fit have fewer memory problems and lose less brain volume than their sedentary counterparts. As little as four hours a week – that's 30 minutes a day – can make a significant difference to the quantity and quality of life.

Haitian kids on Bathurst Street?

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Since last month's earthquake in Haiti, there's been much discussion about the importance of adopting children from that devastated country. Within this dialogue, a debate rages about the sensibility and ethics of adopting a black child from a dramatically different culture, and whether it's too soon.

Regardless, the fact is that many people around the world are clamouring to adopt a Haitian child.

The strange thing is that this isn't happening among Diaspora Jews.

Google "Christians" or "Muslims" and "adopting Haitian," and you'll find lots of information. Google "Jews" and "adopting Haitian," and you'll only find links to Israel.

(According to JTA, early on in this crisis, Israel's social affairs minister, Isaac Herzog, asked his staff to look into the feasibility of Israelis adopting Haitian children who lost their parents in the devastating earthquake on Jan. 12. "We are proud Israel aided the horrible distress in Haiti, and we have a moral obligation, as human beings, to aid these children," Herzog said.)

Jews do adopt children. Certainly there are families up and down the Bathurst Street corridor who have adopted children via long and arduous processes – according to findlaw.com, Jews generally adopt children from such places as China and Colombia. When a Jewish family can't have a child, adoption is clearly an option, if not a spontaneous reaction.

But I think Diaspora Jewry has developed a safe approach to tikkun olam (repairing the world), especially when called upon to react personally and sometimes immediately. Few people truly open up their homes and extend themselves in a way that costs them time, money, space and an emotional investment when an unexpected soul taps on their door.

Case in point: Jewish Family & Child has struggled for years to find enough foster parents for Jewish kids who can't live at home. Why?

Astonishingly, our community has never built a Jewish shelter for the dozens upon dozens of children who have gone homeless, or are unable to deal with their home life or the pressures of being a Jew. While this may be more of an example of outreach, it does reflect a certain fear of dealing with people in need in a hands-on way.

Unlike Israelis, who work to survive every day (and, therefore, are prepared for discomfort), we in the Diaspora are in a comfort zone that holds little room for "indigent" guests.

In November, actor and activist Mia Farrow came to town and spoke about the courageous few who put their lives on the line for others by leaving their comfort zone and investing heavily in "the other." Perhaps we have, after decades of community-building, decided it's just easier to write a cheque than be bothered by the immense challenges that come with bravely sharing our lives with an orphan or troubled teen.

Maybe we have begun to believe that money will fix all of our ills and don't have the time to bring "the other" into our homes?

It would be prudent and Jewish if we all rolled up our sleeves and responded to the calls of Haitian orphans, just as our Christian and Muslim brothers are doing so well. Even if you had not been thinking about increasing your family size, the spontaneous crisis in Haiti is a compelling reason to give it a shot.

Let's not forget how blessed we are, and recognize our ability to protect and nurture children at Jane and Finch, Regent Park, Bathurst Street and Port-au-Prince.

Let me know if you've considered adopting or have tried to adopt a Haitian child.

I'm interested in being proven wrong.

Stock exchanges make a 'shidduch'

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — An agreement signed in Israel last Wednesday between the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange (TASE) and the Toronto Stock Exchange (TSX) was cause for celebration by representatives of both exchanges.

After more than two years of negotiations, executives from the exchanges signed a memorandum of understanding (MoU), which signifies mutual understanding between the exchanges.

The MoU declares the exchanges' intention to develop channels of communication and share information. It is hoped that the agreement will pave the way for the creation of a mutual recognition agreement between the regulatory authorities of each country, which would in turn enable the exchanges to develop a cross-listing agreement.

Although the TSX does have some Israel-connected listings, which are U.S. subsidiaries of companies that started in Israel, it has yet to list any direct ones.

"Over the last 2-1/2 years, I have witnessed the hard work and unequivocal commitment of the TASE and of the TSX in their efforts to make a 'shidduch,' a meeting of the hearts and of the minds," said Jon Allen, Canada's ambassador to Israel. "The signing of this MoU between the two exchanges is a truly fitting culmination of those efforts, of goodwill, and of really... hard work. I really believe this will be mutually beneficial."

Both Ester Levanon, TASE's CEO, and Ungad Chadda, the senior vice-president of the TSX, agreed.

"This is a really exciting moment… We are all very happy we have come to this moment. I think it's going to be a great success for both exchanges," Levanon said.

Anti-Semitic incidents at U of T condemned

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The dean of the University of Toronto's Factor-Inwentash Faculty of Social Work has condemned two anti-Semitic incidents that occurred on campus late last year.

Faye Mishna's condemnation was contained in two separate letters on official university letterhead addressed to colleagues, students and friends. She wrote the letters when she was interim dean.

In the first letter on Dec. 7, 2009, she wrote, "Let me be clear: There is no place in this faculty – or anywhere else at the University of Toronto – for anti-Semitism, discrimination or exclusion of any sort whatsoever. This faculty is unwavering in our commitment to inclusiveness and diversity."

Rupaleem Bhuyan

She acknowledged that the incidents, which occurred in a classroom discussion last November and in a subsequent students' meeting with faculty members, were "profoundly hurtful to Jewish colleagues and students."

Mishna, who maintains a private practice in psychotherapy, said that the incidents created "a rift" among students and faculty.

The News in Brief

Canada

Diab Hearing In June

OTTAWA — An extradition hearing for a Lebanese Canadian man accused in the 1980 bombing of a Paris shul will take place in June, Agence France-Presse reported. Hassan Diab, 56, a sociology lecturer at Carleton University and the University of Ottawa, was arrested in November 2008 in Ottawa at the request of French officials, who want him extradited to face charges in the bombing of the Rue Copernic synagogue, which killed four people and injured 40. Diab, whose bail conditions include wearing an electronic ankle monitor, says he's a victim of mistaken identity. The Crown had sought time to let France gather more evidence, but the judge in the case said he "would not be very receptive" to more delays beyond June.

Video Shown Again

VANCOUVER — Olympic torchbearers in Whistler and Langley, B.C., were still being shown a video with footage from Leni Riefenstahl's Nazi propaganda film Olympia last week, despite assurances from Olympic organizers the video had been withdrawn. Footage of torchbearers for the 1936 Berlin Olympics had been altered to remove Nazi salutes, but the entire video, which was being shown on shuttle buses used by torchbearers, was pulled after complaints from Canadian Jewish Congress. A Games spokesperson told the Globe and Mail that torch relay organizers would be reminded not to use it.

Football Team Sold

TORONTO — David Cynamon and Howard Sokolowski sold the Toronto Argonauts last week to David Braley, who also owns the CFL's B.C. Lions. Cynamon and Sokolowski, noted Jewish philanthropists, saved the money-losing franchise from bankruptcy in 2003.

Two Aspers Resign

WINNIPEG — David and Gail Asper resigned last week from the board of directors of Canwest Global Communications, the struggling media firm founded by their late father, Israel Asper. Gail Asper, a lawyer who heads the family's Asper Foundation, and David Asper, a businessman and lawyer, had been on the board since 1992 and 1997, respectively. The moves were part of Canwest's restructuring. Their brother, Leonard, remains CEO.

NY Times Won't Reassign Reporter

NEW YORK — The New York Times' public editor recommended that the paper's Jerusalem bureau chief, a U.S. Jew, be reassigned because his son joined the Israeli army.

Clark Hoyt, the paper's independent ombudsman, wrote about the issue in a Feb. 6 column, weighing whether bureau chief Ethan Bronner can be objective, and whether the Times' reporting can be seen as fair, given that Bronner's son is serving in the Israel Defence Forces after enlisting in December for 1-1/2 years of service.

"The Times sent a reporter overseas to provide disinterested coverage of one of the world's most intense and potentially explosive conflicts, and now his son has taken up arms for one side," Hoyt wrote. "Even the most sympathetic reader could reasonably wonder how that would affect the father, especially if shooting broke out."

Hoyt said that he has "enormous respect for Bronner and his work, and he has done nothing wrong," but urged he be transferred for the duration of his son's service.

Bronner has been posted in Israel four times in the past two years. He was the Times' deputy foreign editor for four years. He's married to an Israeli psychologist.

The issue was raised by the pro-Palestinian website Electronic Intifada. In a response also published Feb. 6, Times executive editor Bill Keller said Bronner would stay in his post, adding that his family ties "supply a measure of sophistication about Israel and its adversaries that someone with no connections would lack."

He told Ynet Jews have been active in Costa Rican politics and had served in previous governments.

Vancouver welcomes Team Israel to Olympics

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The Vancouver Jewish community welcomed Team Israel to the Olympics last Thursday night with an event that attracted some 800 people to Temple Sholom.

Sponsored by the Vancouver Chapter of Magen David Adom, the event, titled The Frozen Chosen, began with a tribute to the memory of the 11 Israeli Olympic athletes and coaches who were murdered during the 1972 Munich Olympics.

"This Olympics there has been a pledge: never again, and not on our soil," said Rabbi Philip Bregman of Temple Sholom.

One of the attendees at the event was Minister of International Trade and Minister for the Asia-Pacific Gateway Stockwell Day, who spoke of his respect and affection for Israel.

"Israel made a huge contribution to the recovery effort in Haiti, and after the tsunami," he said. "Israel has learned and continues to learn the hard way how to deal with tragedy, and instead of recoiling, it shares its knowledge with others. Whatever Israelis put their mind to, it doesn't take long before they excel."

Another speaker at the podium was Winnipeg native David Greaves, who holds citizenship in Canada and Israel and became a member of Israel's national bobsled team a few years ago.

He spoke of his terror at riding in the rear seat of the bobsled, and his pride at representing Israel on the team.

"You will carry the Magen David, a nation will watch and Jews all over the world will be rooting for you," he told the three Israeli athletes comprising Team Israel at the 2010 Winter Olympics.

"We may be a small nation, but we are the greatest nation in the world."

Asked how it feels to have Jews all over the world rooting for their success, Roman Zaretsky, who will figure skate with his sister Alexandra, told the crowd: "You've got our attention right now. This is amazing!"

He was joined by downhill skier Mikail Renzhin, two coaches and Israel's chef de mission Boris Chait.

"Knowing the history of Munich, we can say we're here to stay as a country and as a team," Chait said. "It's important to win, but it's more important to be ambassadors to the world. We are a small team, but we're going to be fighting for the top spots."

Agricultural research flourishes at Hebrew U

Second of a series.

"Our mission is service to the Jewish people and service to the world," Hebrew University president Menahem Ben-Sasson recently told The CJN. Over the course of a week, The CJN observed how certain members of the university's staff dedicate their work and themselves to the fulfilment of the president's mission.

• • •

Some 41 kilometers north and west of Jerusalem, in the lushly verdant town of Rehovot, rich with fruits and flowers of all kind and a multicolored human tapestry from all parts of the globe, is the university's faculty of agriculture. Its formal name is The Robert H. Smith Faculty of Agriculture, Food and Environment.

From the editor's desk...

The dean of the faculty, Aharon (Ronnie) Friedman is a gregarious, teddy bear of a man, who greets his visitors with a warm smile and a generous handshake.

He spoke to us earnestly and almost emotionally about the faculty of agriculture and its mission.

Like the university itself, the faculty is older than the state of which it is part. It opened in 1942 with 21 students. Today there are approximately 2,200 students. The teaching and research at the faculty stream into four distinct yet clearly related scientific areas: animal, plant, environmental and nutrigenomic sciences.

"We have a firm commitment to feeding the world and alleviating world hunger. Whatever we can do is significant," Friedman said.

And there can be no doubt that the faculty's scientists are doing a great deal. They are at the front in virtually every known agricultural and agronomic battle, Friedman elaborated.

"We have a group of scientists who work on an interdisciplinary basis" to try to solve major problems related to fostering sustainable (safe and efficient) agriculture while protecting, enhancing or rehabilitating the environment.

We met with two scientists who exemplarize this interdisciplinary approach from the starting point of environmental sciences.

Prof. Benny Chefetz is a leading international expert on recapturing, recycling and reusing waste water for the safe use in our agricultural systems. In former times, Chefetz said, the main contaminant in the water that went back to the field was pesticides. Today, they are the spent pharmaceuticals that are transferred into the water systems.

Prof. Yitzhak Hadar is known internationally for his leading work on recycling, re-using and finding some benefit from the large masses of waste that are the unused portion of the crops that grow in the field.

Ronnie Friedman

"We must try to find useful purposes for the byproducts of the vegetables that we grow," Hadar explains.

One of Hadar's current projects, in collaboration with scientists from Italy and Tunisia, is to seek out the potential benefits in the waste that results in the production of olive oil.

Given the ever increasing popularity of olive oil and the scale of the oil producing industry, especially throughout the Mediterranean basin, Hadar's findings may one day have far-reaching significance.

Friedman told us of another faculty member, Prof. Bertha Sivan-Levavi, who was spearheading a vital project in east central Africa to restore and reclaim Lake Victoria as a source of food for the surrounding villagers whose children had over the years become severly malnourished due to the virtual disappearance of stocks of edible fish from the lake.

Three days after our conversation with Friedman, a story about Sivan-Levavi appeared in Ha'aretz. The headline read: "Israeli prof. helps solve food crisis spawned by Nile perch."

The sub-headline in the story was: "Fish pond culture relocates from Emek Hefer to Ugandan communities on shores of Lake Victoria."

Apparently, Sivan-Levavi persuaded the Lake Victoria communities to establish fish ponds (such as at Emek Hefer in Israel) to raise carp. The introduction of the carp was instrumental in saving the children.

Friedman assured us, with the excitement of a proud father, that there were many more such stories of faculty members finding ways to feed the world.

As a further example, to combat the horrific morbidity and mortality rates among infants and young children in certain sectors of East Africa, Prof. Shahal Abbo, introduced a high nutrition, simple-to-store chickpea (humus, in Israeli parlance) for local cultivation by the farmers there. That simple chickpea will significantly enhance the wellbeing and health of all the children in the area.

For the scientists at the Hebrew University's faculty of agriculture, feeding the world's hungry is no mere slogan. It is an imperative call to duty.

–MBD

To commemorate the 85th anniversary of the opening of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, The CJN was recently invited by Canadian Friends of Hebrew University to travel to Jerusalem, visit the university, meet and engage with some of its scholars, researchers and teachers.

Students get ready to counter 'apartheid lie'

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN

Jewish university students are dreading the annual ritual known as Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW), slated to take place on campuses across the country March 1 to 7.

But this year, they'll get a one-week head start on the anti-Israel informational campaign.

Starting the last week of February, Canadian university and college students will begin a pre-emptive, national initiative aimed at bolstering Israel's image and countering negative propaganda. "Size Doesn't Matter" will stress that for a small country, Israel has achieved global renown in science, medicine, technology, business, humanitarian aid and even on cultural fronts.

"We're starting a week before [the IAW kick-off] on all campuses," says Shirin Ezekiel, director of Israel affairs for Hillel of Greater Toronto. "Each day will highlight a different achievement and contribution from Israel."

The second national push, to run concurrently with IAW, will be called "The Truth Campaign," and will feature toy building block-themed posters with the messages, "Don't Twist the Truth" and "Don't Play With the Truth."

They're intended to counter the five central themes of this year's anti-Israel IAW programming: the ongoing boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) drive against the Jewish state; fallout from the United Nations' Goldstone report on Israel's incursion into Gaza in last winter; the attack on Gaza itself, known as Operation Cast Lead; Israel's security barrier, often tagged by opponents as the "Apartheid Wall"; and the central accusation that Israel practises apartheid against Arabs and Palestinians, which the counter-measures will term "the apartheid lie."

A third, undisclosed campaign involving "social media" will be "a surprise," Ezekiel said.

Several pro-Israel speakers are scheduled to appear. "We're trying to target the 80 per cent of students who just walk by and don't really care."

Among the "endorsers" of this year's Israeli Apartheid Week, according to the IAW's website, is "Holy Land Awareness and Action – United Church of Canada."

The Holy Land awareness and action committee, a subcommittee of the Church's Toronto conference's South West Presbytery, was one of the forces behind calls for a comprehensive boycott of Israel last August at the church's General Council meeting in Kelowna, B.C.

All the anti-Israel measures were voted down after delegates heard impassioned speeches from Canadian Jewish Congress.

Still, that episode and others strained relations between the church and many Jews. A Feb. 1 meeting between representatives of the Church and the CJC sought to patch up differences.

A major irritant for CJC had been that the United Church, Canada's largest Protestant denomination, helped fund the creation of Independent Jewish Voices (IJV), a small anti-Israel group that supports the BDS movement. The church has conceded that it "regretted" its prior relationship with the group.

IJV is among the supporters of this year's IAW.

Nora Saunders, general secretary of the church's General Council, said the involvement of the Holy Land awareness and action committee in IAW doesn't mean the national church is onside.

"There has been no endorsement [of IAW] by the United Church of Canada as a whole. This is something that's being dealt with locally as people feel moved to take steps," she told The CJN.

Congress CEO Bernie Farber said Saunders' remarks "follow exactly the discussion" Congress had with the church earlier this month.

"However," Farber added, "it is incumbent on the church to ensure that in the future local affiliates are clearly identified as local."

The sixth annual IAW will feature lectures, film screenings, cultural activities, and demonstrations aimed at "raising awareness about Israel's apartheid policies toward Palestinians and to gather support for the international boycott, divestment and sanctions campaign," a statement said. It added that the campaign takes place in 40 cities around the world.

According to the IAW website, Canadian cities slated for activity are Edmonton, Guelph, Halifax, Hamilton, Kingston, Montreal, Ottawa, Peterborough, St. Catharines, Sudbury, Toronto, Vancouver, Waterloo and Winnipeg.

As of last week, schedules of activities and speakers were posted only for Toronto and Ottawa, where programs are scheduled at Carleton University and the University of Ottawa.

The annual event is always a time of high tensions for Jewish students, Ezekiel said. "It's never quiet during that time. It's not exactly the most comfortable time for students on campus."

Verbal confrontations "can get pretty intense."

IAW "causes a hateful, divisive and intolerant atmosphere" on campus for all students, said Lindsay Lustig, a graduate student in science at the University of Toronto. "It's a toxic environment and it promotes separation of students."

It also shuts down legitimate dialogue "before it can begin," she said.

Jews of all affiliations and levels of involvement "feel threatened" during IAW, said Ryerson University political science student Esther Mendelsohn. "You can't really go to class, feel calm and do your work when you're bombarded with all these events and images," she said.

In Toronto, the public is invited to hear speakers defending Israel. They will include Simon Deng, a Sudanese human rights activist and one-time child slave (Feb. 23, 7 p.m. at Ryerson University, room SCC115; Israeli-Arab journalist Khaled Abu Toameh (March 1, 7 p.m. Ryerson, library hall 72); and Kamal Saleem, a one-time terrorist who renounced radical Islam (March 1, 7 p.m., U of T, Innis Hall).

Colours of Comedy, which brings together comedians of diverse faiths and ethnic background, will stage a show on March 4, 7 p.m. at U of T's Robert Gill Hall.

Islamic radicalism called a mainstream ideology

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

An Egyptian Muslim who was once a member of a banned terrorist organization in Egypt told a synagogue audience in Toronto last week that Islamic radicalism is a mainstream ideology in contemporary Islam.

Tawfik Hamid, now a Muslim reformer, joined the Al-Gama al-Islamiyya movement when he was a medical student in Cairo in the 1980s.

Tawfiq Hamid [Greg Tjepkema photo]

Until it renounced bloodshed in 2003, Al-Gama al-Islamiyya called for the overthrow of the Egyptian government, tried to assassinate Egypt's president and carried out a succession of terrorist attacks culminating with the murder of 58 foreign tourists in Luxor in 1997.

Speaking at Beth Tzedec Congregation in front of a capacity crowd of about 800, the scion of a secular middle-class family related his personal story and warned of the dangers of Islamic militancy.

Considered an authority on the mindset of jihadi Muslims following the publication of his book, Inside Jihad: Understanding and Confronting Radical Islam, Hamid said that Islamic radicalism will remain at the centre of modern Islam until an alternative form of Islam emerges.

"Current mainstream Islamic teachings promote violence," he said.

A physician who lives in the United States, he has written that scholars in prestigious Islamic institutes and universities compare Jews to pigs and monkeys, call for the fatal stoning of adulterers and urge Muslims to spread Islam by force if necessary.

He has also written: "There is a certain schizophrenia among many Muslims who seem to believe that it is acceptable to teach hatred and violence in the name of their religion, while at the same time expecting the world to respect Islam as 'a religion of peace, love and harmony.'"

Hamid, an advocate of a peaceful Islam compatible with universal human rights and intellectual freedom, recalled that Al-Gama al-Islamiyya attempted to suppress his faculty for critical thinking, bottle up his sex drive and convince him that Islam is at war with non-Muslims.

He quit after he was asked to take part in the kidnapping of a policeman who would be buried alive and after he concluded that non-Muslims are not infidels who deserve to be killed.

Charging that religious intolerance in the Middle East has been promoted and nurtured by the Salafi brand of Islam originating in Saudi Arabia, Hamid suggested that Muslim extremists have twisted the meaning of the word jihad to denote warfare against so-called infidels.

He added that Muslim radicals have also defined jihad as a national rather than an individual responsibility, thereby sanctioning suicide bombings.

Claiming that Islamic radicalism feeds on the weak, Hamid said that its acolytes perceive concessions as a weakness.

As a rule, he said, Islamic terrorists tend to be highly educated and do not come from impoverished backgrounds.

Members in Islamic radical groups are brainwashed by rote learning and a skewed form of theology, he noted.

Hamid likened the tension between Islamic fundamentalism and the West to a war pitting civilization against barbarism and love against hate.

Turning to Israel, a topic he has addressed in articles published in daily newspapers in the United States, he slammed the perception that the Arab-Israeli conflict breeds terrorism.

And in an astonishing claim, he said the Koran promised the Land of Israel to the Children of Israel.

Briefly touching on Muslim attitudes to Jews, he said, "Anti-Semitism is rising to unbelievable levels."

Hamid's speech was presented by The Speakers Action Group and Beth Tzedec's Men's Club and sponsored by the National Post, Canadian Jewish Civil Rights Association and the Canadian Committee for the Tel Aviv Foundation.

The moderator, Jonathan Kay, is the comment editor of the National Post.

The blinding force of hatred

Earlier this month, CJN columnist Gil Troy asked the readers of this paper if we were "ready for Anti-Israel Week?" He pointed out that the sixth annual Israel-bashing festival would soon be upon us at the start of March and that university leaders and pro-Israel activists needed an action plan to deal with the conflicting passions that will inevitably flare and the emotions that will be strained to boiling.

Troy offered helpful, pragmatic suggestions to university administrators for upholding the rules of free speech and civil discourse on campus and to students for effectively responding to the provocations that will be unleashed against them. His advice has not come too soon.

On three major campuses last week the haters of Israel attempted to "steal" the speaker's podium. In one case they succeeded.

At a forum organized by the Oxford University Students' Union, Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon was constantly heckled and nearly physically assaulted. One heckler shouted "The Jews should be slaughtered."

At the University of California-Irvine, Israel's ambassador to the U.S., Michael Oren was repeatedly shouted down, interrupted and heckled by a clearly orchestrated rotating chorus of abuse-shouters.

At Cambridge University, The Israel Society surrendered to a campaign of intimidation and harassment by the haters of Israel and cancelled a scheduled talk by Ben-Gurion University of the Negev historian Benny Morris.

These highly-charged haters of Israel are hostile both to the fundamental ground rules of a free, democratic way of life and to truth. In the distorted view they hold of the Jewish state they see it as akin to the 17th and 18th century European colonizers of non-western, non-white societies. But this, of course, is sheer utter nonsense.

In his CJN column Troy advised pro-Israel advocates not to let haters set the agenda.

"Far better to celebrate Israel than to get defensive," he suggested. One of the countless celebratory truths of Israel is the work its scientists perform in trying to alleviate poverty and to reduce hunger in the developing world. Specifically, for example, the international studies program at the Hebrew University's Faculty of Agriculture in Rehovot invites foreign students and researchers to study at the university to enable them to take back scientific, agriculturally based knowledge to their home countries. Since 1988, when the program was launched, through December 2007, some 1,668 individuals from 120 different countries, including from among the most needy in the world, have graduated from this unique program.

As Troy also pointed out, the Israel bashers have no interest in knowing the truth. Their hatred has blinded them to it and, alas, to the better world that might arise if only they would lend their energies to tolerance, fair play and the possibility of co-existence rather than to intolerance, intimidation and the hope of Israel's destruction.

Conversion crisis (1)

Rabbi Reuven Bulka makes some important observations about the conversion crisis currently roiling the Orthodox world in "Some observations on the conversion crisis" (Perspectives, Feb. 4). As mainstream Orthodox rabbis work out their response to haredi efforts to invalidate their conversions, they might want to consider their own attitude toward conversions supervised by Reform and Conservative rabbis who also require the three conversion "ingredients" Rabbi Bulka describes – acceptance of Jewish obligations, covenantal circumcision for males, and immersion in the mikvah. Our conversion study programs require a much lengthier and more intensive commitment than some of those described as having been acceptable in the Orthodox world 20 to 30 years ago. Our understanding of kabbalat hamitzvot falls somewhere within the broad spectrum described by Rabbi Bulka as being halachically acceptable. As Rabbi Bulka notes, not every convert becomes a serious, engaged Jew, but no rabbinical court of any Jewish branch can guarantee that outcome. And most of our Reform and Conservative converts do become active, learned, observant members of our congregations who raise Jewish children and contribute to the welfare of Am Yisrael. Rabbi Bulka says that he prefers to err on the side of welcoming rather than rejecting those who would like to join our people. How about welcoming non-Orthodox converts as well?

Rabbi Edward Elkin, Chair
Reform Rabbis of Greater Toronto

Conversion crisis (2)

The recent articles and op-eds in The CJN regarding the conversion "crisis" have not been sufficiently illuminating. Here are two misconceptions inferred by many from the various articles.

(1) Readers have inferred from the articles that a crass political struggle for power is being waged by the various parties. The haredim, opposed to Zionism, refuse to accept conversions performed by Mizrachi (religious Zionists). This is untrue. The rejected conversions were incompetently carried out. Some were rubber-stamped, and some individual converts were never taught fundamental principles about Judaism, including Shabbat. In other words, it is reasonable to doubt the validity of these conversions.

(2) The power to convert an individual from non-Jew to Jew is invested in the Torah. The most Orthodox rabbi, haredi or Mizrachi, may officiate a conversion, but if Jewish law is violated or if the prospective convert is insincere in his motives, the conversion has failed.

Anti-Semitism on campus

Dear leaders of the Toronto Jewish community:

I had an unpleasant experience last week. While I was walking on the downtown campus at University of Toronto, some guy plunked a splashy leaflet into my hands and said: "Please, let me invite you to Israeli Apartheid Week." (IAW takes places in Toronto, Montreal and other cities from March 1 to 14.)

After one nanosecond, I said loudly: "You are disgusting!" No one joined me in my fuss, and I stood there totally alone.

Where are you, oh Jewish leaders of Toronto, as this anti-Semitic incitement occurs in our publically funded university? Surely you know that IAW is not about dialogue or discussion. It is 21st-century anti-Semitism, and it is directed at you and at me and at our community.

Where is the outrage, you guys. Where is the outrage?

Peled-Elhanan campaigns for a just peace

Your article "CJC, United Church ties remain strained" (Jan. 21) quotes Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber maligning Nurit Peled-Elhanan by comparing her to Ernst Zundel.

Nurit Peled-Elhanan is an Israeli Jew, a professor at Hebrew University and the daughter of an Israeli general who fought in several wars and was later a leader of the peace camp. She is also the mother of a 13-year-old who died in a Palestinian suicide bombing.

Yet despite, or because of, this tragedy, she co-founded, with other Israeli Jews and Palestinians who lost family members in the Israeli-Palestinan conflict, Bereaved Parents for Peace and continues to campaign for a just peace. She refuses to blame only the Palestinians, but assigns blame to Israel where it is deserved. She is a winner of the Sakharov Prize for Freedom of Thought, awarded by the European Parliament.

Fierce debate in Israel over campaign against NIF

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

A campaign against the New Israel Fund – a U.S.-based organization that funds civil society activists in Israel – has sparked a fierce debate over the limits of free speech, the financing of non-governmental organizations (NGOs), the dictates of loyalty to the state, and ultimately, over the fundamental values of Israel's Zionist democracy.

The questions cut close to the bone on both sides of the ideological divide. For example: are left-wingers using Zionist money to undermine the foundations of the state? Or, are right-wingers trying to gag NGOs critical of Israeli policies and actions? And to what extent are the government and its agencies involved in trying to silence their critics?

At the centre of the storm is the Goldstone report on alleged Israeli war crimes during the fighting in Gaza last winter.

Most Israelis see the report as biased, based on flimsy evidence and false assumptions, and part of a concerted international campaign to delegitimize the Jewish state. The attack on the New Israel Fund (NIF) was part of an angry Israeli backlash against the report produced by Richard Goldstone, the judge who headed the UN fact-finding mission on the war. But was it a bona fide attack on an organization accused of undermining Israel's international standing or a premeditated onslaught against civil society?

The campaign against the NIF was conducted by an organization called Im Tirtzu, which describes itself as "an extra-parliamentary movement to strengthen Zionist values" and boasts a video endorsement from Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. It claimed that 16 NIF grantees – among them Physicians for Human Rights and B'Tselem, human rights organizations active in the Palestinian territories; Breaking the Silence, a group of soldiers reporting on Israeli army violations of moral norms; and ACRI, the Association for Civil Rights in Israel – had provided Goldstone with material contributing to false charges against the Israel Defence Forces in informer-like actions that were tantamount to betrayal in a wartime situation.

"The results of these groups' activities caused significant diplomatic damage to Israel and harmed the country's capacity to defend itself militarily," Im Tirtzu said, adding that NIF was largely to blame because it had funded these "anti-Zionist" organizations.

In late January, young Im Tirtzu members dressed as Hamas fighters demonstrated outside the Jerusalem home of NIF president Naomi Chazan waving placards depicting Chazan with a horn emerging from her forehead. The text on the placard read: "Fact! Without the New Israel Fund there could be no Goldstone report and Israel would not be facing international accusations of war crimes."

The horn was a play on words, the Hebrew "keren" meaning both fund and horn, but critics say it also had obvious anti-Semitic connotations that many found offensive.

Im Tirtzu used the image as well in advertisements placed in several Israeli newspapers.

The Zionist Organization of America has seconded the criticisms of the NIF.

The New Israel Fund says it knows that many of the minority rights groups it backs in the name of empowering the disenfranchised and fighting discrimination in Israel also take positions that the NIF does not endorse, such as calling for an end to Israel's Jewish character. NIF officials say that while they do not agree with everything their grantees do or say, revoking their funding would be inimical to NIF's goal of promoting free speech and strengthening Israel's minorities.

"They're using me to attack in the most blatant way the basic principles of democracy and the values of Israel's declaration of independence – values of equality, tolerance, social justice and freedom of speech," Chazan declared.

In dismissing the Im Tirtzu case against the NIF as baseless, Chazan said the materials the groups allegedly transferred to Goldstone are mostly in the public domain. And even if they were not, it would be the duty of the groups to pass on what they know – that is their raison d'être as human rights groups.

Far from giving succor to Israel's enemies, the grantees were trying to create a better Israel, Chazan said.

The NIF and its defenders note that its work goes well beyond organizations focusing specifically on Palestinian rights. It also funds civil society groups dealing with a host of domestic Israeli issues, such as providing women's shelters, supporting Ethiopian immigrants and challenging the Orthodox monopoly on Jewish religious practice.

In early February, a group of leading Israeli academics, writers, actors, directors and political activists, including novelists Amos Oz and A.B. Yehoshua, placed a full-page ad in Ha'aretz expressing "disgust at the campaign of incitement and hatred" being waged against Chazan, the NIF and the organizations it supports.

Several U.S. Jewish groups on the left side of the political spectrum issued their own statements slamming the anti-NIF campaign on similar grounds. The tenor of the anti-NIF campaign was criticized as well by Abraham Foxman of the Anti-Defamation League.

In late January, 13 of the 16 NIF grantees slammed by Im Tirtzu fired off a letter to President Shimon Peres, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Knesset Speaker Reuven Rivlin complaining that the Im Tirtzu attack on the NIF was part of a larger pattern encouraged by "senior government officials." In other words, it was more than a one-off campaign by a young, marginal group, but part of an anti-democratic trend for which the government was setting the tone.

Jewish right-wing activists dressed as Arabs demonstrate late last month against the New Israel Fund (NIF), an organization committed to democratic change within Israel. The signs say: "Thank you, Naomi Chazan, the New Fundation, Friends from Gaza." [Yossi Zamir/Flash 90 photo]

They gave some examples: Interior Minister Eli Yishai backing claims that organizations which help refugees and asylum seekers "aim to destroy Israel"; Netanyahu denying the legitimacy of Breaking the Silence testimonies on the Gaza war; Strategic Affairs Minister Moshe Ya'alon referring to Israeli human rights organizations as "enemies from within."

Others see the spectre of an impending clampdown against civil society.

Anat Hoffman, chair of Women of the Wall and director of the Reform movement's Israel Religious Action Center, an NIF grantee, was questioned and fingerprinted by police in early January after taking part in an all-female prayer session at the Western Wall that involved the use of a Torah. A week later, ACRI director Hagai El-Ad was arrested while monitoring a protest against Jewish settlement in the Arab neighbourhood of Sheik Jarrah in eastern Jerusalem, and released as soon as the case went to court.

Were these isolated cases of police folly, or part of a pattern dictated from above?

There is no hard evidence to suggest that the Netanyahu government is planning to curb civil society or that the police action had the prime minister's blessing. What is clear is that Netanyahu is deeply concerned by what he calls "Goldstonism" – moves in the international community aimed at delegitimizing Israel.

The prime minister says he sees three existential threats: Iran, a Palestinian state without adequate security arrangements, and rampant Goldstonism. This means that Israeli organizations the government feels contribute to delegitimization of the state could be seen as serious threats to national security. But the government does not seem to be considering operative moves against them.

Moves, however, are afoot in the Knesset.

The law committee, headed by Yisrael Beiteinu's David Rotem, whose party has proposed that Israeli citizens take loyalty oaths, has set up a subcommittee to examine the sources of funding of NGOs active in Israel. Some of the committee members aim to ban funding by foreign countries, which is seen as interfering in Israel's internal affairs. Most of that funding is from European countries for left-wing NGOs.

Otniel Schneller of the Kadima party wants to go a step further, proposing the establishment of a full-fledged parliamentary commission of inquiry to probe the conduct of the NIF and its grantees. Schneller says he is against the absurdity of Israeli civil society "paying organizations like Physicians for Human Rights to slander us," and wants to stop the NIF from supporting anti-Zionist groups.

Schneller's proposal, which he plans to submit next week, has run into stiff opposition from the left and right.

Left-wing Meretz leader Haim Oron asked who would decide who is a Zionist or what are Israel's best interests. Schneller, he suggested, should fight the left-wing organizations with counter arguments, not try to cut off their funding.

On the right, the Likud's Michael Eitan argued that parliamentary commissions of inquiry are established on non-political issues, such as corruption in soccer or water prices.

"It is unheard of for the majority in the Knesset to investigate the minority," he fumed.

Eitan's stand has the support of others in the Likud, like Rivlin and Minister without Portfolio Benny Begin, and it is not clear whether Schneller can muster a majority for his proposal.

Meanwhile, Im Tirtzu's funding has also attracted scrutiny in recent days.

Liberal organizations and bloggers have been reporting that Im Tirtzu has received money from the Central Fund of Israel, a U.S.-based non-profit that has also supported pro-settler organizations and a group that aids militant Israeli Jews accused of carrying out violence. They also note that Im Tirtzu reportedly has received $200,000 (US) over the past two years from John Hagee, an evangelical pastor in San Antonio, Texas, who is staunchly pro-Israel but came under fire for having declared in a sermon that God allowed the Holocaust to happen as part of a plan to bring Jews to Israel.

Hagee has expressed regret for the upset caused by his remarks and promised to be more sensitive in the future. A spokesperson for the pastor criticized the tenor of Im Tirtzu's campaign against NIF.

Meanwhile the debate goes on, with each side seeking to claim the mantle of preserving Israel's fundamental nature.

"Today the question is not whether Israel survives, but what kind of Israel survives," said Daniel Sokatch, the NIF's chief executive officer.

Im Tirtzu leader Ronen Shova countered that "the debate is not about left or right. The new debate is between Zionists and non-Zionists."

Cleaning up Rights and Democracy

Created through an act of Parliament in 1988, the International Centre for Human Rights and Democratic Development – later to be referred to as Rights and Democracy (R&D) – was created as a non-partisan organization with an international mandate. Its stated mission is to encourage and support the universal values of human rights and to promote democratic institutions and practices around the world.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Run by a government-appointed board and support staff, R&D came under public scrutiny in 2007 when it was criticized for its perceived lack of adequate disclosure and oversight. As well, some of its policy decisions have been previously questioned. For the most part, however, the organization has managed to avoid public attention and has, for all intents and purposes, gone about its business, supposedly spreading Canadian goodwill far and wide.

But what has emerged in recent weeks sheds a whole new light on the agency. All it seems has not been squeaky clean, and serious questions are now being raised not only about the governance of R&D but also, more importantly, about how taxpayer dollars are being spent under its auspices.

What is especially troubling about all of this is that within the broader context of alleged fiscal and fiduciary missteps by the organization's bureaucrats there lurks a seamy subtext, with the Middle East at its epicentre.

At issue is the allocation by R&D of some $30,000 to organizations that are known to be hostile to Israeli interests. Two of these, Al-Haq and Al-Mezan are especially toxic, demonizing and delegitimizing the Jewish state through boycott, divestment and sanctions initiatives and actively promoting "lawfare," the process of exploiting legal channels to harass Israeli officials for their supposed violations of international law.

But as scandalous as it is that government funds have been channeled into the coffers of such groups, some of the reaction to these disbursements is what should concern us even more. Rather than applauding board members who have shown great courage and initiative in disclosing these facts (among others), there are those in the media and opposition political parties who are delighting in turning this fiasco into a partisan battleground, accusing the Harper government of loading the board with its supporters and baying for their dismissal.

Those taking most of the heat – among them political scientist Aurel Braun (who chairs the board), specialist in international law Jacques Gauthier, and human rights lawyer David Matas – have acted selflessly and in the public interest.

Nonetheless, when seeking nothing more than accountability and transparency, they have instead been subjected to a malicious smear campaign. It's deplorable that this is happening.

A beacon of light amid gov't mediocrity

On Jan. 27, a man displeased with proceedings in his divorce case in Family Court entered a chamber of Israel's Supreme Court and, with no warning, hurled a pair of shoes at Supreme Court President Dorit Beinisch. One hit her smack in the middle of the face, breaking her glasses and knocking her off her seat. Fortunately, she wasn't seriously injured and returned to the court an hour later, welcomed by very uncharacteristic applause.

Yair Lapid in Jerusalem

This episode appropriately symbolizes the bashing that Israel's public legal community has unjustifiably endured of late and the need to ensure that all is done to thwart attempts to seriously tamper with it.

Israel's judiciary and its civil service's legal establishment, headed by the attorney general, are valued for their intellect, professional skills and independence. Neither judges nor the attorney general are elected. They're appointed after committees evaluate their legal prowess, integrity and suitability.

Traditionally, the Supreme Court has been one of the country's most highly regarded institutions, but this respect has recently waned. The Israel Democracy Institute publishes an annual Democracy Index that "reviews public attitudes concerning democracy, the measure of support for it, and the level of satisfaction with [its] functioning." One of the indices it monitors is the level of trust in the Supreme Court. According to the latest study, published last year, since 2004, confidence in the Court has plummeted, from 79 per cent to 57 per cent, although it's still the second-most trusted public institution in the country, second only to the army, in which 79 per cent of Israelis still have confidence.

The decline can be attributed to public perception of the court as an institution not in synch with the populace. Its judgments overturning security-related decisions, particularly when these uphold Palestinians' human rights, don't sit well with an increasingly centre-right constituency. The court is also perceived as a nepotistic, mostly Ashkenazi, secular body, with insufficient representation from other sectors of society, a view that's been exacerbated by some legitimate complaints about court appointment procedures.

The shoe throwing incident overshadowed another important occasion. Several days later, Menachem Mazuz concluded six turbulent years as attorney general, arguably one of the country's most difficult, stressful and powerful positions. The attorney general is both the government's top legal adviser (but not its lawyer) and head of the state's criminal prosecution services. A gifted attorney who had a distinguished career in the Justice Ministry, Mazuz was replaced by a relative outsider, Yehuda Weinstein, who headed a prominent white-collar defence practice for more than 30 years.

During his tenure, Mazuz oversaw an unprecedented array of high-profile criminal proceedings against politicians. Early on, he decided not to indict then-prime minister Ariel Sharon in two celebrated cases (but indicted his son for campaign finance offences in one of them). Later, he marched prime minister Ehud Olmert, president Moshe Katzav and several ministers and MKs into court as criminal defendants, effectively forcing most of them to leave their lofty positions. Olmert's and Katzav's cases are still being adjudicated. Two former ministers are serving lengthy prison sentences for embezzling public funds.

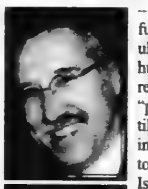
Mazuz's responsibilities weren't limited to criminal law. During his years in office, Israel was involved in several significant military operations. Aside from the military challenges, these operations have placed Israeli jurists on the cutting edge of the legal war against terrorism. They've also placed Israel Defence Forces commanders on the receiving end of legal threats and condemnations, most notably the UN's Goldstone report on the Gaza war, which accused them of war crimes.

Both Beinisch and Mazuz also found themselves sparring with politicians. Some want to limit the Supreme Court's jurisdiction to rule on certain matters, as in the present legislative initiative to curtail courts' authority to exercise judicial review over Knesset laws. Others want to politicize court appointment procedures. Yet others want to whittle away the attorney general's authority.

Our judicial system is far from perfect. Courts are understaffed and overworked, and justice is often delayed and sometimes denied. Improvements should be made. But Israel's courts and its legal civil service remain a beacon of light in a sea of governmental mediocrity, and all attempts to make substantive changes to them should be averted.

The New Israel Fund and Goldstone

Ma'ariv, one of Israel's mass-circulation dailies, recently featured a scathing condemnation of the New Israel Fund (NIF) for leading the political war to demonize Israel. The journalist who wrote the piece, Ben Caspit, is a political centrist whose tolerance snapped when he realized that non-governmental organizations (NGOs) funded by the NIF were responsible for most of the "war crimes" allegations in the UN's Goldstone report on the Gaza war.



Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Caspit's article amplified the Israeli debate on the role of the NIF – a Diaspora-based superpower with an annual budget of around $25 million. The accusations were publicized by Im Tirtzu, a student group promoting Zionist renewal, which also placed ads on websites and in newspapers ridiculing the organization and its leader, Naomi Chazan.

Like other politicians whose power is threatened, Chazan and the NIF leadership responded furiously, denying the evidence and threatening legal action. However, having themselves used personal and crude graphics against opponents, the threats from Chazan and the NIF lacked credibility. While claiming to defend free speech, the NIF's fierce attacks on critics were themselves attempts to silence a much-needed public debate.

Israeli anger toward the NIF also reflects the discovery of a hidden agenda, in contrast to Im Tirtzu and other openly more right-wing organizations. In its advertising and fundraising, the NIF claims to provide broad support for different groups in Israel, but many of its actions promote a very narrow and radical agenda.

The most politicized NGOs – including B'Tselem, the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, and Physicians for Human Rights-Israel – receive about 20 per cent of NIF funds. They use the money to manipulate Israeli politics, while exploiting human rights rhetoric to demonize responses to terror. These NGOs also "partner" with some of the most hostile foreign groups, using their clout in the media and the United Nations to promote the political assault on Israel's legitimacy, as seen in the Goldstone campaign.

Some of the budget for the NIF's funding of these radical NGOs comes from the Ford Foundation. The fiasco of the 2001 Durban NGO Forum, which ran alongside the United Nations World Conference Against Racism and was financed in large part by the Ford Foundation, led to an investigation in the U.S. Congress. Foundation officials agreed to end direct support to these NGOs, but quietly provided large sums money ($40 million US to date) to the NIF. Similarly, the NIF's role is cited by European governments and, until recently, by Canada (via CIDA and the embattled group Rights and Democracy) in justifying the flow of taxpayer funds to the same NGOs that systematically attack Israeli policies.

As a result, for most Israelis, the NGOs nurtured by the NIF, the Ford Foundation and Europe constitute a powerful and entirely undemocratic opposition force. As head of the NIF, Chazan wields more power than she had as an MK before being rejected by Israeli voters. She and other NGO officials, funded from the outside are very visible in the media, in lobbying the Knesset and in bombarding the courts to try to impose their ideology. The very controversial decision to re-open route 443 between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv to Palestinian vehicles was largely the result of pressure from these NGOs. When the first Israeli is attacked due to this decision, NIF officials and donors will be blamed.

For all these reasons, the NIF is in deep trouble, and its officials would be well advised to join in developing funding guidelines (rather than attacking different voices) and ending patronizing attempts to impose their private agendas on the rest of us. Among the NIF's more than 300 grants, many go to schools and other worthy projects, but many Israelis view this as a cover for a more sinister political agenda.

As the fierce debate demonstrates, with so much money and influence, outside power brokers from across the ideological spectrum have the obligation to provide far more transparency, accountability and diversity. Israelis have lost patience with campaigns to manipulate their critical choices and promote Goldstone-type demonization. If NIF officials don't make these changes voluntarily, Israel's elected officials will exercise their right and their obligation to impose democratic control.

The Kirshner File

The 'forgotten' war is back in the news

The bitter war in Iraq has been supplanted by the "forgotten" war in Afghanistan.

Until quite recently, the raging insurgency in Iraq, with its incessant suicide bombings and endemic sectarian violence, preoccupied the foreign policy establishment in Washington.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The United States, having deposed Saddam Hussein's Baathist regime after its 2003 invasion of Iraq, found itself enmeshed in a seemingly endless and costly war, amid failed attempts to uncover Iraq's supposed weapons of mass destruction. Consequently, many Americans began questioning the rationale, if not the assumptions, of this protracted war.

As the situation in Iraq worsened, the war in Afghanistan faded from view, despite Afghanistan's notoriety as the former base of Al Qaeda – the radical Islamist movement headed by Osama bin Laden – and the incubator of the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks on the financial and military symbols of American power, the World Trade Center in Manhattan and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C.

Lashing out at its Islamic fundamentalist tormentors, the United States bombed Afghanistan, unseated the Islamist Taliban government that had sheltered and encouraged Al Qaeda, installed a pro-western government in Kabul and launched a war against the remnants of the Taliban and Al Qaeda.

All eyes were on the Afghanistan front until Iraq displaced it from the daily news cycle. But as violence in Iraq has dimmed and hopes have risen that Iraq can be reconstructed, the focus has shifted to Afghanistan, where the insurgency has escalated to worrisome levels.

Hard, cold statistics tell the story.

In 2001 and 2002, there was not a single suicide attack in Afghanistan, and American and allied casualties were negligible.

But as the western military presence has grown and the Taliban has regrouped, thanks to its sanctuaries in neighbouring Pakistan, the bloodshed has increased substantially, spreading from the volatile south to the once tranquil north.

In 2008, the number of annual suicide bombings reached a new plateau of 148, while roadside bombings – the bane of western and Afghan troops on patrol – shot up to about 3,200. These blasts killed 520 American and allied soldiers last year, far more than in Iraq in 2009.

All in all, 1,520 foreign troops, including almost 1,000 Americans and 139 Canadians, as well as thousands of Afghan civilians, have been killed in Afghanistan thus far.

The Taliban, having replenished its coffers through extortion, taxation and the opium trade, has redoubled its efforts to drive home the point that the American-backed government of President Hamid Karzai is vulnerable.

In an audacious operation in Kabul on Jan. 18, Taliban fighters detonated bombs close to the presidential palace, the ministry of justice and the central bank, killing five Afghans and wounding 70.

The attack underscored the fact that Afghanistan, far from pacified and stabilized, is on a dangerous "downward spiral," as the chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, Adm. Mike Mullen, has commented. Recognizing that a more aggressive and innovative approach was urgently required, U.S. President Barack Obama replaced the American commander in Afghanistan and rushed still more troops there.

After replacing Gen. David McKiernan with Gen. Stanley McChrystal – whose forces captured Saddam Hussein and killed Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq – Obama dispatched an additional 51,000 troops to Afghanistan, 21,000 early in 2009 and 30,000 some months later.

With this infusion of manpower, the United States now has approximately 100,000 soldiers in Afghanistan, the better to protect civilians, build infrastructure, improve governance and hunt the Taliban.

In sending reinforcements to Afghanistan, Obama found himself between a rock and a hard place.

While McChrystal warned that the United States risked losing the war unless considerably more forces were sent, the American ambassador in Kabul, Karl Eikenberry, formerly the top U.S. commander in Afghanistan, expressed grave reservations about McChrystal's strategy.

Saying he wanted to reverse Taliban gains and bring the war to "a successful conclusion" without an open-ended commitment, Obama chose a middle course, agreeing to send fresh troops to Afghanistan while vowing to bring them home by mid 2011.

Like his predecessor, George W. Bush, Obama is convinced that the United States has vital interests in Afghanistan. Last March, he said his goal was to "disrupt, dismantle and defeat" Al Qaeda so that Afghanistan and Pakistan cannot be used as platforms from which to attack the United States and its allies.

In August, Obama called the United States' involvement in Afghanistan "a war of necessity" rather than "a war of choice." In December, he declared, "If I did not think that the security of the United States… (was) at stake in Afghanistan, I would gladly order every single one of our troops home tomorrow."

Hamid Karzai

Stanley McChrystal

Richard Holbrooke

It is doubtful whether Obama will be able to disengage from Afghanistan next year, judging by the frank comments of Afghanistan's president and senior officials in the Obama administration.

Karzai has speculated that five to 10 years will be needed to build an effective Afghan army and police force to provide security once the Americans withdraw. Robert Gates, the U.S. secretary of defence, has referred to the war in Afghanistan as "our greatest military challenge" and pointedly said he is not bound by deadlines. James Jones, Obama's national security advisor, has observed, "We're going to be in the region for a long time." Gen. David Petraeus, the U.S. commander in Asia, has warned that Afghanistan will tax American resources for years to come. Richard Holbrooke, Obama's special representative to Afghanistan and Pakistan, has said that the war in Afghanistan will be "much tougher" than in Iraq, and will be "a long, difficult struggle."

One of the reasons the United States will likely remain in Afghanistan far beyond Obama's artificial and politically motivated deadline is Karzai's dysfunctional and corrupt government, which is kept afloat by billions of dollars in U.S. aid, but which cannot deliver the most basic services and security, much less honest and transparent national elections, to the Afghan people.

Such is the rampant corruption in Kabul that Karzai – whose brother and defence ministers have been accused of being drug traffickers – is perceived as a potential liability and an impediment to American objectives. "The government we have been supporting in Afghanistan is a fetid hothouse of corruption, a government of gangsters and weasels whose customary salute is the upturned palm," charges Bob Herbert, a New York Times columnist.

Indeed, Karzai's lame government reminds observers of the weak, ineffectual pro-American South Vietnamese regime of the 1960s and 1970s.

The war has lasted so long, in part, because of Pakistan's insufficient resolve to root out the Taliban and Al Qaeda in its northeast frontier region. The Pakistani army has mounted campaigns in the Swat Valley and South Waziristan, but not in North Waziristan or Baluchistan, where the Taliban's senior leaders and military commanders reside. In an attempt to fill the gap, the United States has stepped up drone missile attacks in Pakistan, much to Pakistan's public annoyance.

A military solution, however, is not attainable, as Gen. McChrystal has acknowledged. The ultimate path to peace in Afghanistan, he has said, is through a pragmatic arrangement in which power is shared with less radical members of the Taliban after they lay down their arms and repudiate violence. In the meantime, though, the fighting goes on.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Adar – the month of happiness

By RABBI ZUSHE SILBERSTEIN

Our Sages teach us: "When Adar enters, we increase our happiness." How? What will enable us to reach greater – and more genuine – happiness?

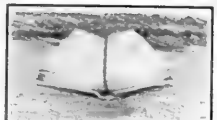
The most elemental answers are given by TV and radio. Buy this or eat that.

Give yourself a high and you'll feel good. You'll be happy.

Chassidic thought teaches: "Happiness breaks down barriers." On a basic level, this means that when a person is happy, he feels freer to break through the restraints of social norms and even the constraints of his own character. He will let loose and act with natural ease, reaching out to people and into himself without worrying about whether it's socially proper or even whether it fits his own self-image.

It's not only as a result of being happy that a person bursts through such restraints. Happiness itself is the force and the dynamic through which these restraints are broken. Unless a person knows how to step beyond who he thinks he is and what he thinks he wants, he'll never be more than momentarily happy. He'll always have concerns and anxieties that inhibit him.

The buy-it-and-have-a-good-time happiness of modern society isn't genuine, because it leaves a person within himself and his prior conceptions. It doesn't challenge the person or make him grow.



Rabbinic Reflections

Genuine happiness has to do with being able to let go, to spontaneously flow without worry or concern.

We can recognize such innate, natural happiness in certain people, but it appears to be precisely that: something you either have or you don't, not something that you can work for and achieve.

Judaism explains that happiness comes from accepting the yoke of God's service and, therefore, can be achieved through a person's efforts. Such a person does not live for himself. His or her own wants and desires are not the be all and end all of this person's existence. His or her life has purpose and direction and a heritage of more than 3,500 years that demonstrates the meaning and depth of the lifestyle that he or she has accepted.

Significantly, this approach also empowers a person to appreciate the happiness granted by everyday life with more energy. As long as a person is concerned with his own gratification, he will never be able to sit back and really enjoy his life. He's concerned with: am I getting enough? Is this what I'm supposed to feel? But when a person isn't looking for happiness as an independent goal, he will be able to appreciate it in every experience he encounters. He will taste food, watch a sunset and enjoy the people he meets, appreciating all these experiences for what they are.

The ultimate experience of such happiness will come in the era of the Redemption, when "crowned with eternal joy," we will proceed with Mashiach to Eretz Yisrael. Since in that era, "the occupation of the world will be solely to know God." We will not be possessed by self-concern. That in turn will grant us this all-encompassing joy. Against the backdrop of peace and prosperity, we will experience the ultimate self-fulfilment that stems from the connection to God and His will.

The knowledge that we are at the threshold of this moment endows us with the potential to perceive a foretaste of this happiness in the present time. And the appreciation of this foretaste will anticipate the full realization of this prophecy, hastening the time when "a voice of happiness and a voice of rejoicing" will fill the streets of Jerusalem.

A difficult question

Several weeks ago, I spoke at an Anglican church about the major tenets and teachings of Judaism. During the question period that followed, a university student asked a familiar but difficult question: "Why did God who personifies love, mercy, justice and truth allow the Holocaust to happen?" Why did God allow the Germans to murder six million innocent men, women and children?

Some years ago, an Orthodox rabbi visiting Hamilton suggested that the Holocaust was God's way of punishing wicked and sinful Jews. Indignant and outraged, community members protested that surely the Jews of North America were no more pious and religious, or less sinful. It was blasphemous to declare that the slaughtered Jews deserved cruel punishment. As a matter of fact, many of them were piously observant to the most minute detail. Moreover, Jewish belief rejects vicarious suffering.

Jews who believe that the miracles reported in the Bible did indeed occur must confront the question, why did not God create a miracle to save millions of innocent lives? If God suspended the laws of nature so that the Israelites might cross safely to dry land; if He made the sun stop for Joshua to win a battle – then why did He not save a million and a half innocent children? Certainly they were deserving of a miracle! How can true believers explain this "hiding" of God? It will not do to argue about God's gift of free will to human beings. The omnipotent God who thwarted the evil plans of Pharoah could have set aside the evil intentions of Hitler.

Harold Kushner, author of the widely read book When Bad Things Happen to Good People, proposed the idea of a limited God. He writes that the "many forms of evil are not the will of God, but represent that aspect of reality which stands independent of his will and which angers and saddens God as it must anger and sadden us."

Martin Buber expressed doubt as to whether, after the Holocaust, he could address God as kind and merciful. At the same time, however, he never surrendered his faith in the human potential to redeem evil and sanctify the world.

Rabbi Richard Rubenstein asserts that, in the light of the Holocaust, God is no longer a reasonable source of belief. His relationship to the covenant and to Jewish history must be redefined. He said: "An infinitely sadistic or capricious God might exist; a less than omnipotent God might exist; a God who is indifferent to the actors in human history might exist, but the just, righteous and all-powerful God, as understood within Jewish tradition, could not exist. Thus, one would have to conclude that the experience of Auschwitz presents a most serious challenge to the understanding of both God's nature and his relationship to the Jewish people."

How did I answer the young man's question? I began by acknowledging that I was ignorant of the ways and intentions of God, and that apart from the usual inadequate explanations, I could offer no convincing arguments or original ideas.

I did point out, however, that, although many who suffered in Nazi death camps abandoned their religious faith, others found their way back to affirming faith in both God and Judaism. How could they place either confidence or hope in human beings, capable of creating the horrors of the Holocaust?

I suggested, perhaps the proper question to be asked is not, "Where was God," but rather, "When was God?" And to answer that God was there in the minds and hearts of those who, at the risk of their lives, shielded and saved those in distress and, despite the enveloping dread around them, showed concern, mercy and love for others.

Jewish Life

Does God use nature to punish? Discuss

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Did God cause the recent earthquake in Haiti? This question, and many similar inquiries about God's involvement in human affairs, can be understood in various ways and almost always provides a Rorschach-type window into the respondent's theological priorities and emotional sensibilities.

For those who wish to emphasize God's connection to Creation without placing the Creator in an unflattering light, the answer might be that the nature of geological realities beneath our feet means that yes, ultimately, the Earth that God made is subject to great volatility.

But such an answer avoids a direct confrontation with the divine role and now begs a rewording of the question: "Does God cause earthquakes for a specific and predetermined reason?" Others will want to point to the human responsibility in these tragedies, such as faulty building construction and shoddy materials, as though to shield the original "Builder" from all liability.

But for many people, such "answers" often appear as evasions of the central theological quandary of innocent suffering. Their real desire is to fathom the unfathomable – why do vast numbers of ordinary men, women and children die horribly and without warning, as they are simply trying to live their lives as best they can? Even the Holocaust – the central, but by no means exclusive, template in our time for this anguished question – really does not serve as an accurate analogy for what philosophers call natural evil, those events which have relatively little to do with human action and more properly fall under the domain of "forces of nature," or what the insurance industry is wont to still call "acts of God."

What is striking is the public uproar when any religious figure even attempts to put forward any version of a retribution theodicy – the idea that people are being punished by God for sin. Deemed as far more than just politically incorrect or insensitive, these "explanations" are castigated in all quarters, including those of many devout Jews and their coreligionists in other faiths, as scandalous and obscene, an arrogant presumptiveness regarding divine motives.

The outrage over this kind of talk, no matter how speculative, marks one of the central shifts from ancient to modern religion, as such retributive theologies were the stock in trade of many Jewish and Christian texts down through the ages.

The avoidance of talk of retribution, while perfectly logical, does, however, place the relationship between God and the world in an interesting straitjacket. Do we say that God is completely uninvolved, having simply unleashed the potential for forces that annihilate the human body and spirit and then stepped out of the way? Do we prefer to say that divine intervention is historically time-bound, leading to the odd spectre that the very active biblical God has now dropped out of sight? What do we make of previous Jewish texts that were not at all hesitant to ascribe blame to the Jews for their historical fate? (One only need think of the yearly Tisha b'Av ritual and its accompanying literature.)

I fully concur with those who resist any attempt at explanation, but good educational practice would demand that we examine what this refusal to explain tells us about our modern situation as believing Jews, and our uneasy truce with God.

New approaches to Megillat Esther

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

For many of us, the story found in Megillat Esther is fodder for children's plays and satirical skits. But if you've never taken a second look at the story of Esther, Mordechai and the other familiar characters, you may be surprised how textured this story of court intrigue, attempted genocide and ultimate deliverance can be. Before Purim starts, take a read or two and bring new meaning to the Megillah ceremony.

Chabad.org's Megillah page is a great one-stop resource where you'll find an English translation, a printable English/Hebrew Megillah, a Megillah with commentary and a rhyming version of the story. You can even listen to the entire Book of Esther delivered in just more than 42 minutes but as the page says, "One fulfils the obligation of listening to the Megillah on Purim only by listening to a live reading." [bit.ly/megil1]

In "The Upside-Down World of Megillat Esther," Rabbi Yoel Bin-Nun asks some difficult questions. Why was a story "devoid of any sacred material," one that doesn't even mention God, included among the holy books of the Tanach? Rabbi Bin-Nun suggests that having a story in which God does not overtly appear actually teaches us an important lesson. Even when it seemed as if God is out of the picture, He still facilitated the Jewish victory. Rabbi Bin-Nun then asks another question: how could Esther, a daughter of Israel, enter the Royal Chambers? Why isn't "her coerced participation in the contest of beauty and sexual appeal… described as a tragedy and a horrifying nightmare?" You'll have to read the article for the answer to that one. [bit.ly/megil2]

"Feminist Aspects of Megillat Esther" examines the actions of the strong female characters of the story ,such as Esther and Vashti. We see how Mordechai considered Esther a full partner in saving the Jews and convinced her to accept her mission despite the risks. "Esther responds to Mordechai's appeal, and from that moment forth, the initiative passes to her – and she alone plans and implements all the steps that lead ultimately to the salvation of Israel." [bit.ly/megil3]

In addition to being an important religious document, megillot can also be beautiful works of art. Illustrated and illuminated with scenes from the Purim story, they often reflect their country of origin rather than traditional Persia. An Italian Megillah on view at the Library of Congress has the historic characters in 18th-century dress. [bit.ly/megil4] And if you have $3,995 to spare, you could do worse than to pick up a facsimile of an 18th-century illuminated manuscript of the Book of Esther reproduced on fine parchment in a hand-tooled silver case. If you'd prefer to save the four grand, visit this website for an education into how a piece of religious art is shaped into existence. [bit.ly/megil6]

If you don't mind the occasional groaner, then take a listen to a "modern" interpretation of the story of Purim. Here's a sample: "This attempted political coup which became known in the Persian press as 'Palace-gate'… After years of legal deliberations, the two assassins were found guilty. And since the jury was not hung, the assassins were." [http://bit.ly/megil10]

All these sites are great when you're sitting at your computer but what about Purim night? That's when you need the marvelous Megillat Esther app for your iPhone or iPod Touch. As you scroll down the um, scroll, you are presented with the full Hebrew text of the Megillah. But what makes this really fun are the buttons that deliver sounds, including air horn, machine gun, crowd booing, firecrackers and of course, the classic gragger. Just shake for a random noisemaker. Best of all, the Megillah app is free. [bit.ly/megil9]

Many of the mitzvahs associated with Purim mentioned in Megillat Esther are discussed at length in the Talmud's Tractate Megillah. Now, hold that thought. Years ago, a certain alcoholic drink commissioned a series of ads that features the beverage's uniquely shaped bottle. In honour of Purim, some very creative typesetters have transformed a genuine page of Talmud to include the outline of that distinctive bottle containing "100 Spoof Vodka from Shushan." [bit.ly/ megil8]

Enjoy. Drink moderately. And have a wonderful Purim. Absolut-ly!

Law prof fights discrimination against Sephardim

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

An Orthodox girls school in a small Israeli town put up a wall to divide its students some two years ago. Yifat Bitton spent the next two years working to tear it down.

Bitton, who spoke Feb. 4 at Adath Israel Congregation as the guest of the New Israel Fund of Canada, is a lawyer and co-chair of the Tmura Center, an Israeli civil rights group.

Last summer, the centre gained a legal victory against the Beit Yaakov school in Immanuel, Israel, which segregated Ashkenazi and Sephardi students, built a wall to divide the two groups and used a separate educational curriculum.

Bitton was involved in taking the case to Israel's Supreme Court, which ruled in her favour and ordered the abolition of any segregation. But this legal victory may not translate into a tangible one, she said.

"This is too early to celebrate. This [decision] is irrelevant to the [students]. They go tomorrow to school the same way they went to school for two years," she said, adding that the only change the school made was to dismantle the wall.

"Practically nothing substantial has happened... The classes miraculously were still structured in the same way. Ashkenazi on one side, Sephardi on the other."

Bitton, an associate professor at the School of Management Law School in Israel, works to raise awareness about discrimination against Mizrahi (Sephardi) Jews in Israel. Mizrahi Jews are those who originated in the Middle East, Central Asia, North Africa and the Caucasus, which include Armenia, Azerbaijan and Georgia.

Yifat Bitton

"This Immanuel case is representative of what's going on in Israel," she said.

Bitton said this can be seen in employment statistics. About 7.5 per cent of the Mizrahi population in Israel are unemployed, compared to the 1.5 per cent of Ashkenazi Jews who are unemployed. In Israeli universities, about nine per cent of the faculty are Mizrahi Jews, while 90 per cent are Ashkenazi Jews and one per cent of the faculty are Arabs.

This discrimination isn't limited to social institutions, Bitton said, adding that it's difficult for Mizrahi youth to get into night clubs in Israel.

"They're simply not allowed into night clubs," she said. "These are guys that won't even categorize themselves as Mizrahi Jews. They'll say, 'We're Israeli.'"

Bitton added that there is little awareness of any discrimination against Sephardi Jews in Israel.

"Jewish society thinks of itself as an egalitarian one. It's a homeland for all Jews," she said.

"When you're not told that something is a result of discrimination... you'd rather not see it as discrimination," she said. "You have to know what the disease is in order to treat it."

Yaldeinu leaders heading to Cuba

Compiled by CJN Staff

Yaldeinu, a charitable organization that provides Jewish education to Jewish children and young adults in Israel and developing countries, recently announced its first overseas volunteer mission.

Yaldeinu's emerging leaders development mission to Cuba, from April 11 to 18, will be made up of young leaders, largely from Toronto's Jewish community.

"This mission is being held to show our solidarity with the Cuban Jewish community's young leaders," said Michael Ettedgui, the organization's founder and executive director.

"Canadian participants will volunteer their services, taking part in hands-on projects to help their Cuban brothers and sisters. Mission participants and their Cuban peers will also partake in joint educational and recreational programming."

The mission, which costs $2,000, including flights, meals and accommodations, is being subsidized by Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee.

"We want to support young people who are willing to give of themselves and learn about Jewish life in countries like Cuba," said Avrum Rosensweig, president of Ve'ahavta. "We are happy to provide a $500 sponsorship to the first 12 registrants of this mission."

Family gift to Tomorrow Campaign honours memory of art lover

Sylvia Dzialoszynski Waks Rotunda will be gateway to new Koffler Centre

Sylvia Dzialoszynski Waks z"l enjoys Venice's Piazza San Marco, during a 2007 trip to Italy.

By Daniel Horowitz

While most typical Jewish mothers would be perfectly satisfied to spend the winter months poolside in Florida, Sylvia Dzialoszynski Waks z"l preferred whiling away the hours studying Renaissance art at the University of Toronto.

But then again, as anyone who had the great good fortune to know Sylvia would tell you, she was anything but typical.

Sylvia, who passed away on December 20, 2009 surrounded by her loving family, was an elegant, intelligent and passionate woman with a deep and abiding love for art.

A Holocaust survivor who was hidden by a non-Jewish Polish family outside the Warsaw Ghetto, Sylvia came to Toronto in 1949 where she quickly met the love of her life, Henry. They were married for 57 years and had two sons - Fred and Jay.

"My parents were best friends, and absolutely inseparable," said Fred. "They shared the same passion for art, Yiddishkeit and tzedakah. Because of the war, mom wasn't able to receive the education she would have liked but she always said, 'if you're passionate about something, learn everything you possibly can about it.'"

And she clearly practiced what she preached. "My mom spent the last thirty years of her life studying art at the University of Toronto," explained Fred. "Despite the lack of a formal education, she was extremely intelligent, well-read, and could take on anyone when it came to questions about art."

"She would stay up until all hours of the night reviewing, rereading and studying; feeding her insatiable appetite for art history," said Jay. "She loved to learn about all forms of art. She wanted to learn about modern art just in case she felt obligated to correct one of her art history professors during a lecture."

So, when Henry, Fred and Jay were looking for a special way to honour the family's matriarch by combining her love of Yiddishkeit, tzedakah and art, they looked to UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign and the future Koffler Centre of the Arts, and, after making a $1.5 million gift, The Sylvia Dzialoszynski Waks Rotunda was born.

The Rotunda bearing Sylvia's name will be an area of high prominence within the new Centre. With visibility from both the external areas of the Sherman Campus as well as from the Ellen Prosserman Atrium, the uniquely designed Rotunda will welcome visitors to the rich array of programming offered at the Koffler.

"Outside of the Basilica in Rome, this space at the new Koffler Centre would have been mom's favourite place on which to have her name attached," explained Fred, chair of the Koffler Centre of the Arts Foundation and an art major. "While spiritually speaking Israel was her favourite place, intellectually and architecturally speaking, it was Italy. The opportunity given to us through the Tomorrow Campaign at the new Koffler Centre provided the perfect recipe to honour mom's memory whiling respecting her love for tzedakah, Yiddishkeit and art, and creating something that was as unique as she was. It was the perfect fit."

"The Sylvia Dzialoszynski Waks Rotunda will be a beautiful, inspiring and welcoming space at the heart of the new Koffler Centre of the Arts," said Murray Koffler. "We share the Waks family's love of the arts and Jewish culture and are thrilled they have made this important gift to the Tomorrow Campaign."

Sylvia, who was involved with Hadassah-WIZO, Hebrew University and was a Lion of Judah through UJA Federation adored, and was adored, by her seven grandchildren and her great-granddaughter, Emily.

"The night before mom died, she was surrounded by her entire family," said Fred. "Emily was in bed with her and we all talked with her about anything and everything we could. She was completely lucid right to the end. At two in the morning, I sent everyone home while dad, Jay and I stayed with her until she passed way at 8:00 a.m. the next morning."

"My mother enriched and touched all of the lives of the people that she met, and we will always carry the reminders of her passion, her generosity and the love that she bestowed upon us," said Jay.

Iranian actions make need for sanctions more urgent

Last week, Iran once again dominated foreign news coverage, this time with its announcement that it was pushing ahead with higher-grade nuclear fuel enrichment for "medical" research and was planning to start construction of 10 nuclear sites this year.

Tehran's declaration came against a background of continuing domestic unrest despite the regime's brutal crackdown on political protests, including the recent hangings of two young dissidents. (As the Feb. 11 date marking the 30th anniversary of Iran's "Islamic Revolution" approached, Tehran indicated that it wouldn't tolerate further anti-government protests.)

Its declaration also prompted western governments to threaten tougher economic sanctions to try to thwart Iran's nuclear plans that, they fear, are aimed at developing nuclear weapons.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Anne Gearan of the Associated Press reported on Feb. 9 that at an impromptu news conference held that afternoon, U.S. President Barack Obama said that, since it appears Iran has "spurned" his offer of negotiations, the United States is developing a "significant regime of sanctions" for consideration at the UN Security Council.

However, as Canwest's UN correspondent Steve Edwards noted (in "Iran negotiation led 'to nothing,'" National Post, Feb. 9), "while Russia has begun to reverse its hard-line opposition to more sanctions, China, whose economic expansion relies in part on continued supplies of Iranian oil, remained uncommitted. New evidence China has overtaken the EU to become Iran's largest trading partner underscores the economic tie." As one of the permanent five members of the Security Council, China has a veto, and many analysts believe Beijing would use it to block another round of sanctions.

In a followup story on Feb. 10, Edwards wrote that Obama is prepared to take action against Iran even if that means working around the Security Council – such is the urgency of the Iranian threat for the United States.

Adding a note of skepticism about what Iran can achieve in the near future in its nuclear program, Sam Segev (in "Iran playing its hand" Winnipeg Free Press, Feb. 9), said that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's "announcement that his country will begin enriching its stockpile of low-grade uranium to 20 per cent grade is not being taken very seriously in Israel.

"Israeli scientists and scholars see the announcement as part of the gamesmanship that Ahmadinejad is playing with President Barack Obama and with other western leaders. They say this is not the first time that Ahmadinejad is making such a threat. It's part of the bargaining in the Persian Bazaar at which Ahmadinejad has been such a good player."

Segev didn't name these scientists and scholars, but mentioned an unnamed "former Israeli Mossad operative" who's followed Iran's nuclear program and claims that Iran currently lacks the capacity to produce 20 per cent enriched uranium, adding that it would take "many more years" to achieve this.

This analysis came as a surprise to Hershell Ezrin, CEO of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy, who recently spoke with a range of Israeli and foreign experts about Iran at the Herzliya conference (as reported in last week's CJN, "Iran hijacks Herzliya Conference agenda"). Even though no one can say with absolute certainty what Iran is technically capable of, "the consensus view," Ezrin wrote, "is that Iran has been accelerating its efforts to produce nuclear weapons. Expectations are that Iran will achieve the nuclear bomb threshold including critical ignition testing in the months ahead."

In "Nuclear Iran must be stopped, Israel says" (Globe and Mail, Feb. 10), Patrick Martin indicated that Iran's 20 per cent enrichment claim was indeed being taken very seriously in Israel, prompting Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to call for immediate "crippling sanctions." Martin wrote that "While weapons-grade uranium is enriched to contain at least 90 per cent of the fissile isotope U-235, Iran's intention to move to 20 per cent enrichment from the current 3.5 per cent is considered an ominous development. It is the low level of enrichment, experts say, that is the most laborious and time- consuming part of the process." And he cited one of these experts urging that action against Iran be taken soon, since the move to 90 per cent enrichment, for weapons, is the relatively easy part.

Bands get set to battle for education

Compiled by CJN Staff

Local teens have planned a benefit concert for Free the Children, with proceeds directly supporting the building of schools in developing countries through the organization's Brick by Brick campaign. The concert will be from 7:30 p.m. to 11 p.m. March 6 at Dufferin Clark Community Centre, 1441 Clark Ave. W., Thornhill.

Founded in 1995 by then 12-year-old Toronto-area child rights activist Craig Kielburger, Free the Children is the world's largest network of children helping children through education.

"The Brick by Brick program is great because it empowers us to promote the importance of education while also raising money to build much-needed schools in places like Haiti, Kenya, Sierra Leone and Sri Lanka, among others," said 17-year old Eli Krapivnik, one of four teens involved in planning the event.

Hosted by two of the Toronto-area's leading Jewish teen movements – B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO) and Canadian Young Judaea (CYJ) – the show will feature five local teen bands, said Kevin Goodman, program director at BBYO.

"The bands competing are all young local groups – Pursuit of Reality, Suburban Addiction and Vybe Tribe have so far been confirmed. Demand for auditions was high, and with only five spots, we're expecting an evening of phenomenal talent, while raising awareness as teens for a cause we're passionate about," said Simon Axelrod, representing CYJ on the event's planning committee.

Axelrod expects a crowd of about 200 teens. Each band will play a 40 minute set, with the top bands set to receive prizes that include gift certificates to stores and attractions as well as recording time courtesy of Soundhouse Studio.

The concert is an example of tikkun olam, organizers said, adding that helping to give every child an education is an important step in breaking the cycle of poverty for future generations.

Tickets to the show are available for $12 from participating bands or by contacting BBYO at 416-398-2004 or info@bbyo.ca.

JEWISH STUDENTS MEET: Students from Calgary, Edmonton, Winnipeg and Saskatoon were in Edmonton last month for the annual Canadian Federation of Jewish Students' conference. Some 50 students attended the conference, which was held Jan. 15 to 17 and focused on the importance of Israel advocacy on campus. The weekend included speakers such as David Tal, chair of Israel studies at the University of Calgary and a student-led panel discussion on topics such as the recent UN Goldstone report on last year's Gaza war.

Rabbi re-examines Ten Commandments

By MICHELLE BITRAN
Special to The CJN

Following the Ten Commandments is not as simple as it seems, said Rabbi David Levin-Kruss at a lecture last week.

Speaking at The House, a Jewish social meeting place, Rabbi Levin-Kruss of the Pardes Institute of Jewish Studies in Jerusalem, encouraged his audience to challenge the fundamental rules of Orthodox Judaism.

Rabbi David Levin-Kruss

"I think piety is the enemy of good Torah learning," said Rabbi Levin-Kruss, 44, during his speech, called "In Praise of Envy, Adultery and Disobeying One's Parents: The Ten Commandments Revisited."

The rabbi added that challenging traditional Jewish law helps students to better understand it.

In that spirit, Rabbi Levin-Kruss asked his audience to identify some of the benefits of disobeying one's parents, of jealousy and of adultery.

"I'd say a lot of progress in history has come from people disobeying their parents," said Rabbi Levin-Kruss.

He went on to explain that people should use the law carefully to grow as individuals, and not as an excuse to remain forever reliant on their parents.

According to Rabbi Levin-Kruss, in Western law, parents are indebted to their children, but if children give the same sort of "unearned love" they receive, the relationship between parent and child will grow stronger.

Rabbi Levin-Kruss also made it clear that the Torah stipulates that honouring one's parents should not come at the expense of maintaining a strong value system. For example, he said, if a child's parents ask them to break the Sabbath, the child can decide to respectfully disobey their parents.

Rabbi Levin-Kruss argued that this same type of mindful approach should apply with respect to envy. "The jealousy of scholars increases wisdom," he said, explaining that a little bit of envy can help a person advance his or herself. However, balance is key. When a little bit of jealousy becomes an obsession with getting what someone else has, "that will drive you crazy," said Rabbi Levin-Kruss.

"It's when I want my neighbour's actual wife that it's a problem." He added that focusing on getting what belongs to others speaks to an "inherent lack of self-esteem."

Rabbi Levin-Kruss also talked about the strict rules governing intimacy and marital relations in Orthodox Judaism.

According to the rabbi, the laws about the relationship between husband and wife are designed to combine sex and love in order to achieve a stable marital life, and through that, a stable home.

If a couple finds that following the intimacy laws doesn't strengthen their bond, Rabbi Levin-Kruss said that finding a workable balance can be a better way for couples to benefit from the intent behind the laws.

"You can keep the letter of the law, but sometimes be destroying the spirit," said Rabbi Levin-Kruss.

According to him, the thoughts surrounding observance can matter as much as the actions themselves.

The goal is "to make Halachah [a way to] enrich life instead of a way to cord-off parts of it," said Rabbi Levin-Kruss. "Slavishly keeping the system can be very, very harmful."

TORONTO JEWISH FILM FESTIVAL PRESENTS

SRUGIM

3 EPISODES Another example of the high quality television produced in Israel, Srugim has become a huge hit among secular and religious Jews alike who find this vibrant piece of Israeli pop-culture identifiable and terribly addictive. Set in modern-day Jerusalem, Srugim presents a smart and funny portrait of the world of religious Jewish thirty-something singles. The intelligent men and women of this series seek to reconcile their religious observance, the expectations from their elders to marry early, and their need for warmth and companionship. But beyond its Jewish milieu, Srugim speaks compellingly to all those who struggle to find love and themselves. Israel 2008, 3 x 30 min, Hebrew with English subtitles.

Israeli finance minister spreads economic message

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Israel's Minister of Finance Yuval Steinitz recently had an opportunity to spread Israel's economic message to Canadian government and business leaders.

In Ottawa earlier this month during a North American tour, Steinitz, who had previously met Canada's Finance Minister Jim Flaherty in Israel, met with other government ministers as well as Opposition Leader Michael Ignatieff.

Steinitz "was astounded by the pro-Israel voices amongst the ministers he met with," said Jacques Shore, national vice-president of the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce, who was among the business and community leaders at a reception for Steinitz held at the residence of Israel's ambassador to Canada, Miriam Ziv.

Steinitz was "able to convey the message of a strong and vibrant economy against a backdrop of living in a difficult neighbourhood," Shore said. "He did extremely well in sharing information about the buoyancy in Israel's economy... His mission here was to be able to express this message, to extol the virtues of doing business in Israel and to seek new partners in Israel."

In addition to Flaherty and Ignatieff, Steinitz met with Rona Ambrose, minister of public works; Treasury Board head Stockwell Day; Peter Kent, minister of state for foreign affairs (Americas); Jason Kenney, minister of immigration; and Vic Toews, minister of public safety. He shared with them details of how Israel has fared during the global economic slowdown and the country's optimistic outlook as its economy is improving. Israel's well-known successes in the high-tech and biotechnology industries were also topics of discussion.

At a press conference following his meetings, Steinitz outlined some of the measures Israel has instituted to help weather the recent economic storms.

"The crisis is not yet over, but we feel we will cross the economic crisis without too much damage. We came out with a... taxation plan. We raised taxes, but made a seven-year commitment to reduce taxes. This will give us some kind of an advantage, as we did the opposite of most countries," he said.

"We think we are on the eve of significant economic growth, focused mainly on promoting high-tech industries and biotechnology, advanced agriculture devices, satellites and many other things. We think we should promote co-operation with Canadian companies."

[Peter Waiser photo]

At an earlier business roundtable, Steinitz met with representatives of various companies including MDS Nordian, which specializes in molecular medicine; wireless solutions company Belair Networks; and management-consulting firm Cyrus Echo.

Steinitz was pleased by the warmth and intensity of friendship demonstrated by government ministers, said Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee.

On his return to Israel, "he carried that message back to his colleagues at a cabinet meeting. I think it will be a catalyst for a real exponential increase in bilateral partnerships," Fogel said.

Orthodox shuls can't sustain daily minyans

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Winnipeg's largest Orthodox synagogue, Herzlia-Adas Yeshurun Synagogue in the south end of the city, no longer has a stable minyan, and neither does the south end Chabad-Lubavitch.

Haskel Greenfield, who lost his father this past December, said there were quite a number of days where he went to Herzlia to say Kaddish, but it didn't have the 10 men required for a minyan.

Greenfield told The CJN that "some days we can get a minyan, and other days we can't. When my mother died six years ago, there was a minyan at Herzlia every day. But that is no longer the case now."

According to Rabbi Ari Ellis, spiritual leader of Herzlia, which has a membership "of between 80 to 100 units, families and singles," there are days when the shul doesn't get a daily morning or evening minyan.

"The minyan is not stable enough. Especially in the winter when people go out of town, we are not able to keep a daily minyan," Rabbi Ellis said "We are generally able to get a minyan two to three days a week, in addition to Shabbat. It varies. Some days we get one, some days we don't."

He added that this has been the situation for the "last year and a half" since he came to Winnipeg.

"I have considered whether we ought to go to a three-day-a-week minyan, instead of a daily one. We would have it on Sunday, and Monday and Thursday, days when we read from the Torah, in addition, of course, to Shabbat... But I have been hesitant to do this, as once we were to go to a three-day-a-week minyan, it would be pretty hard to ever go back to a daily minyan," he said.

He also said that he tries to " encourage an interested person to make a commitment to do one thing a week, and at times, I'd like them to consider coming to a Shabbat service or attending a class I lead, and if they'd rather do either of those things, attending a minyan won't be their first priority."

Rabbi Avrohom Altein of Chabad-Lubavitch, said that Chabad also doesn't have a daily minyan in the south end.

"We have one every Shabbes and Sunday morning," Altein told The CJN.

When he arrived in the city 18 months ago, Rabbi Ellis said he explored the idea of having members of his synagogue join Chabad daveners in the south end to make a daily Orthodox minyan viable.

"I have tried to work with Chabad in the south end to see if we could join together to ensure a daily minyan in the south end, which sometimes could be held at Herzlia and sometimes at Chabad, but it hasn't happened. It's been difficult to co-ordinate," he said.

According to Rabbi Altein, in the north end of the city, the Ashkenazi Congregation, the Talmud Torah Beth Jacob Synagogue and Chabad North have joined together in a "sharing" arrangement to ensure a daily minyan.

"The Ashkenazi has minyans on weekday mornings, but not on Shabbes. Talmud Torah has no minyans during the week, but has on Shabbes. Chabad North has minyans in the evening and on Shabbes," Rabbi Altein said.

Watered-down 'divestment' resolution passed at McGill

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Opponents of a motion denouncing companies that allegedly profit from Israel's "unlawful occupation" of Palestinian territory succeeded in having the offending clauses removed before it was passed by the Students Society of McGill University (SSMU) General Assembly last week.

After a couple of hours of at times heated debate, an amendment was adopted that withdrew from the motion's preamble, which stated: "Whereas McGill University continues to have ties with organizations that engage in and profit from unethical practices including, but not limited to, profiting from the unlawful occupation of the Occupied Palestinian Territories, the occupation of which has been declared illegal by the following organizations: the United Nations Security Council, United Nations General Assembly, International Court of Justice, and the International Committee of the Red Cross."

A second clause listing UN resolutions and international covenants said to have declared the illegality of the occupation was also dropped.

No other country was condemned in the original motion.

The amended motion was passed by a wide margin.

The SSMU is the official representative of all McGill undergraduates.

The motion, titled the defense of human rights, social justice and environmental protection, had been proposed by the campus group Solidarity for Palestininian Human Rights (SPHR), which is an active proponent of the international boycott campaign against Israel.

The adopted motion does, however, call for greater scrutiny of the "ethical practices" of any corporations which McGill does business with or invests in, and urges the SSMU to advise the administration to avoid companies it thinks are not respecting human rights.

Hillel Montreal criticized the original motion as a "hijacking and mockery of the human rights agenda" and urged all students to vote against it.

Hillel advocacy director Jason Portnoy warned in an e-mailed alert: "The human rights agenda is once again being hijacked for the sole purpose of advancing the narrow and petty political agenda of demonizing Israel."

A capacity crowd of over 600 students attended the semi-annual GA held Feb. 10 in the Shatner building cafeteria under tight security. Everyone entering had to show their undegraduate identity card, and no online voting was permitted.

Sebastian Ronderos-Morgan, the SSMU vice-president of external affairs, said that no actual count of the vote, by show of cards, on the contentious motion was recorded because the SSMU's rules permit motions to pass if support can be visually determined.

Ronderos-Morgan underlined that only the "be it resolved" clauses of motions adopted become SSMU policy. Therefore, if this motion had passed as originally submitted the statements referring to illegal occupation and profiteering in the Palestinian territories would not have become the position of the SSMU.

The SSMU considers motions signed by at least 100 students (as in this case) or that are proposed by four members of its legislative council, he explained.

The two speakers of that council have the discretion over whether to place motions on the GA agenda, he said. One of those speakers is Hillel Montreal president Zach Newburgh.

Critics of the inclusion of this motion and one brought forward also by SPHR at the GA one year ago condemning Israel for its alleged bombing of educational institutions during the Gaza war of December 2008-January 2009 say they are contrary to the spirit of the SSMU constitution, which states that "the SSMU Council will not take a position on external political issues that Council deems to be extremely divisive among students at McGill University."

Ronderos-Morgan said that the clauses were , "I would venture to guess that one of the considerations the speakers [made in letting the SPHR motion through] was that the 'resolved' clauses, which become actual policy, are not extremely divisive."

The binding clauses call for the SSMU to affirm its commitment to human rights and to either expand the mandate of its Financial Ethics Review Committee or create a Corporate Social Responsibility Committee that would investigate companies' negative ethical practices and call upon the university administration "to divest from companies that do not meet specified criteria for ethical investment."

Last year's motion on Gaza was shelved by a recorded 436 to 263 vote during a stormy GA. Opponents said the SSMU GA was not the appropriate forum for debate over the Palestinian-Israeli conflict.

SPHR's latest motion avoided any specific mention of Israel.

Reconcile or find a good shoulder to cry on

Family Matters

by John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP

Question: When a three-year common law relationship breaks up, how do the assets and earnings get divided? We live in a house that my partner owned before we met. My partner looks after our son, which is a far larger matter, but I think I understand how the law of custody relates to my child in these circumstances.

Answer: You may be considerably screwed. Unless you can prove that you contributed financially or indirectly to the acquisition or improvement of your partner's house, you have no right whatsoever to any share of it since you are not married to him. In fact, unless you have a court order confirming that you are entitled to share in the equity of the home because you directly or indirectly contributed to its improvement, then he could legally kick you out of the house tomorrow without any notice.

The most common way of proving such a contribution is if you paid for part of a monthly mortgage commitment, utilities or realty taxes. The sole exception to this rule might be in those cases where you could prove that you were his tenant through a record of consistent monthly payments or lease agreement, or if you have signed a cohabitation agreement with him giving you "rights of possession."

In common law relationships, in the absence of such a court order acknowledging proof of such contributions or in the absence of a cohabitation agreement, whatever is in your name is yours and whatever is in his name is his. There is no "sharing" in the values of your assets (or debts). Jointly owned assets are divided equally.

In your particular case it gets worse. Since he's currently unemployed and you are working, then you may have to pay him spousal support until he finds a job, even though you are not married. For the purposes of spousal support, he becomes a "spouse" (married or not) who is entitled to receive such support (but not property division) after cohabiting for more than one year if you share a child, or after cohabiting for three years if you don't.

If that isn't bad enough, since your partner has been the one primarily looking after your son, in the event of a court challenge he is in a better legal position than you to get custody or at least primary care of him. Moreover, you may also be stuck paying child support according to a table geared to your yearly gross income, not his. So either reconcile or find a shoulder to cry on.
